CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

Sweden, Norway, and Denmark had already demonetized silver, and the United States in 1873 followed stealthily in their wake. England had been on the gold standard since 1819. None of these things had affected the relations of the two metals; but when Germany, to whom France had agreed to pay one thousand millions of dollars as war indemnity, determined on demonetization, France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, and Greece, in order to protect their stocks of gold, limited their coinage of silver. In 1878 they totally suspended. Silver thus began to fall in 1873, and had already fallen greatly when in 1878 we passed the Bland bill, providing for the coinage of at least $2,000,000 a month.

We hoped it would rise under the impulse of this measure, but it has continued to fall. As it has fallen here so it has fallen in Europe and Asia; or, what is the same thing, gold has risen. In the mean time two international monetary conferences have been held in Paris—one in 1878 and one in 1881. A study of the proceedings of these conferences, especially of that of 1881, is instructive. From this study, which I have made most carefully, two conclusions follow: First, that there was then in 1881 a general concurrence in the truth of what Bismarck said, "the blanket gold was too narrow to cover the nations that were tugging for it." The commerce of the world had vastly increased, and the supply of gold was falling short. Secondly, the gold standard nations represented there, Great Britain and Germany especially, were anxious over the situation, and held out inducements to France, the United States, and other nations to adopt free coinage.

If they would do this Germany was willing to restore part of its silver circulation; Great Britain offered to use more silver. But France and the United States were represented by statesmen who were not carried away by any feeling of vengeance against those who had wrongfully demonetized silver in the United States, who were influenced by no motives of hostility to any class of our citizens, and who considered the question calmly on its merits. These representatives of the United States were S. Dana Horton, W. M. Evarts, and Allen G. Thurman.

In the course of Mr. Thurman's reply to a "questionaire," he said:

Each of the propositions, as I understand it, requires that the United States and France, and perhaps the chief states of the Latin Union, shall open their mints, and keep them open, for the free and unlimited coinage of silver into money having full legal-tender quality. It is not for me to say what France or the states of the Latin Union, or other states of Europe here represented, may think of such propositions. Their delegates will answer for them if they see fit to do so. I can speak in reference to my own Government alone. Would such an agreement as that proposed be acceptable to the United States? I am bound, speaking frankly, to say I think it would not. There is a great and vital difference between a grand bimetallic union, that, by fixing and maintaining a stable relation between gold silver, would stop, or, at least, powerfully tend to stop, the efforts so often made to drain a state at one time of one of the metals and at another time of the other, and a little and half-way union that might leave each state liable to a recurrence of such drains.

Now, if I understand the views of my Government and of the American people, they do not desire an alternative standard, gold to-day and silver to-morrow, nor a single standard, whether of silver or gold, and certainly not a single silver standard. Their stock of silver money is less in proportion to the wealth and population of the country than that of most commercial nations, while on the other hand their stock of gold is very large, is steadily increasing day by day, and is likely, unless prevented by some blunder, to continue to increase.

Under such circumstances, it is but natural that the Government should hesitate to enter into an agreement, the effect of which might possibly be to lessen the amount of our gold. It would cheerfully become a party to a great bimetallic union, which, if formed, would of course open its mints to the free coinage of silver; but I must be permitted to doubt whether, without such a union in existence, it will by convention surrender its power over its own coinage.

What Thurman was unwilling to pledge the United States to embark upon, even with the aid of Switzerland, Belgium, Greece, Italy, and France, namely, the unlimited coinage of silver, I am unwilling, by my vote, to say this Government shall undertake single-handed.

The advocates of unlimited coinage ask how the silver of Europe and Asia can come to the United States when most of the silver is coin and passes now at a higher ratio in relation to gold than that established by law in the United States. The answer is that clipped and mutilated coin, finding no recoinage in Europe, will come here; the annual supply of the world from the mines, less what is used in the arts, will come here; silver bullion, whether it is coin melted in great fires or old ornaments, or in whatever shape it may be, will come here; and whenever pressure is brought to bear upon any European bimetallic country to redeem its silver coin in gold, as they are all obligated to do, it must have gold. It will not be able to get it from the mines; it will not be able to get it with silver in Europe, because all the mints there in gold-using countries are closed to silver, and it must come to America, where gold can be had for silver until our gold is exhausted.

Again, India, which is upon silver alone, pays many millions of pounds sterling to England, obligations incurred before the fall of silver. All this must be paid in gold. India loses now 25 per cent. in the transaction. If we will take her silver and coin it side by side with our gold, that silver will come here and gold will go to Europe. There is no nation whose interest in bimetallism is greater than ours. We are midway between gold-using Europe and silver-using Asia. We must have gold for our commerce with the one and silver for our trade with the other. I am unwilling to give up either. To establish free coinage is to give over our gold to Europe in exchange for its silver. It is to relieve the distress that is now pressing Germany and England toward bimetallism, and thus to give up for the present all hope of re-establishing the relation between silver and gold. The present distress of Europe results from the demonetization of silver there and the scarcity of gold.

Contraction of the currency of a country means a shrinkage of the values measured by that currency. This shrinkage means the paralysis of commerce and industry. It buries capital; it starves labor. No one will buy what can be bought cheaper a fortnight hence. No one will manufacture what can be made at a lower price next month. So, finding nothing to do abroad, money goes back home, and becomes, as it is now, cheap in money centers, not because it is abundant, but because there is no demand for it. It goes begging for borrowers because no prudent man will use it. This has brought about trade depression all over Europe. English statesmen are beginning to seek a remedy. Mr. Childers, chancellor of the exchequer, eighteen months ago proposed to coin a sovereign one-tenth less in value than the present one. Mr. Grenfell, the president of the Bank of England; Sir Thomas Montague and other great bankers, Mr. Thomas Sutherland and other great ship-owners, are urging bimetallism; and the sentiment in its favor grows in England with every day of the continued distress that is depressing the industries of Great Britain.

In Germany, as wages fall, as labor is thrown out of employment and prices shrink, the revolution in public sentiment in favor of bimetallism has become so great that Herr Scholtz, the German minister of finance, in the Reichstag, on February 21, 1886, stated that the empire "was ready to consider measures for protecting the value of silver within its own national boundaries if any practicable plan could be brought forward for relieving the pressure of monometallism complained of by the farmers and other land interests."

There is reasonable ground to hope that these great nations, before they shall emerge from the dark days they are now passing through, will consent to join us in the restoration of silver. I will not consent to vote for the passage of a bill which will enable these nations to relieve their necessities by draining us of our gold. This would be fatal to the present prospects of silver.

But, Mr. Chairman, while I am unwilling to vote for unlimited coinage, I yet can not consent to the repeal of the Bland act. To my mind there is no argument in the declamation on this floor about the "dishonest dollar." If the dollar is dishonest because its bullion is equal to but 80 cents in gold, then our half-dollar is dishonest because it equals but 37 cents in gold, and the nickel 5-cent piece is dishonest because its bullion value is but seven-tenths of a cent. What gentleman is there on this floor who would not start at the proposition that he was no better than a thief because he paid the newsboy only a nickel, a dishonest coin, for a newspaper?

The truth is, a coin is worth just what it will buy. If a silver dollar will purchase, as it does, just as much as a gold dollar, it does equally honest work and is just as honest a coin as the yellow dollar. The fact that the silver dollar has for seven years maintained itself side by side with gold is a refutation of the fundamental proposition of the monometallists that the State can weigh and measure coin, but that it is powerless in any manner or to any extent whatever to affect its value. It is a demonstration of that truth imbedded by our fathers in the Constitution, that Government can not only coin gold and silver, but may, to some extent at least, "regulate the value thereof."

All history, however, warns us that there is a limit to this power of the law. France, Belgium, and other European countries ceased to coin silver because they feared they were nearing the danger-line; and no one knew better than the framers of the Constitution of the United States that this control of the law over coinage might be abused, and for this reason they took away the power over money from the States. The original States, especially Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, had their fiat-money troubles and taught their lessons before our Constitution was made. In Rhode Island, McMaster tells us, the law could not give State-bank money circulation even with the help of test-oaths and a statute making it misdemeanor to refuse it.

Coming further down in our history, we find that the greenback dollar, though a legal tender, was once worth only 38 cents and reached par by a slow and painful process. These considerations, Mr. Chairman, are enough to cause us to pause and ponder over the proposition advanced by President Cleveland in his message that the Bland act ought to be repealed, because there is a limit to the power of the law to regulate money. His opinion is certainly entitled to be treated with respect; but seeing that gold continues to come to America, that the proportion of our silver to our gold and to our population is yet so small, and believing that the circulation of all the silver already coined may be readily secured by providing for the issuance of two and three dollar certificates, I shall not vote for the repeal of this act. Our refusal to provide by unlimited coinage, a method by which the gold standard nations of Europe may obtain our gold, will be a proclamation to them that if they would relieve their present distress they must enter with us into a bimetallic union. Our failure to repeal the present law will be to all these nations an earnest that bimetallism has one constant friend, who will heartily co-operate in any measure for the rehabilitation of silver.

Mr. LANHAM. I yield a moment to the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to know whether that can be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that the motion to recommit is not in the possession of the gentleman from Missouri. The previous question is prevailing, and it is now in the possession of the House. I have no objection, however, to any arrangement, if one can be made; I merely state the condition of the question.

Mr. MORGAN. The previous question has, by order of the House, been set for half past 5 o'clock this evening, when it is to be considered as ordered.

Mr. BLAND. I send to the desk and ask to have read a short newspaper extract.

The Clerk read as follows:

SILVER DEBATE IN THE HOUSE—A VOTE TO BE TAKEN ON THE QUESTION OF FREE COINAGE TO-DAY.

Most of the afternoon in the House yesterday was taken up in the discussion of Mr. Bland's bill for the free coinage of silver, which was adversely reported to the House by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. There was an extra session in the evening for the same purpose, and the discussion will be continued to-day until 5.30, when a vote will be taken. It is not expected that a majority of the House will vote for free coinage of silver; even Mr. BLAND himself does not hope for such a vote. It is a foregone conclusion that the bill will be lost.

Mr. BLAND. That is enough. I simply desire to say that as far as that article quotes me as an authority for the statement made it is, I trust, unnecessary for me to tell the House that it is entirely without any foundation. I hope the House will do its duty, and I believe it will, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair). The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to recommit the bill. Is there objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, having heretofore spoken at length upon this question, and in favor of the free coinage of the silver dollar, I wish now to say but a few words, and then leave to others the continuance of the discussion.

It can not escape critical inspection that when the question of silver coinage was submitted to this Congress a conspicous feature of that submission was the alleged necessity for suspension in order to promote the well-being of the poor people of the country.

In the message of the President we find the words "banks and rich speculators" in contradistinction to the "laboring men and women of the land, most defenseless of all," "the rich and money-lender," "the pittance of the widow and orphan," "the savings of the poor," "the price of labor," "the wage-worker," "the debtor class," "the vast army of the unemployed," and "labor and capital." It was but natural that the suggestions growing out of these terms and the connections in which they were employed should elicit investigation at the hands of the representatives of the people; and from the very necessities of the case the earnest inquirer has found himself in quest of the actual relationship which these classes respectively sustain to the question involved.

Some of us have reached the conclusion that the suspension of silver-dollar coinage is in the interest of the bankers and capitalists and detrimental to the prosperity of the masses and laboring poor of the country, and expressed ourselves accordingly, whereupon we have been met with such statements as, "It is exceedingly unfortunate that there should be a tendency to divide our people along the line of wealth, and thus create a prejudice of one class against another."

If with the capacity of deglutition which has characterized us too much in the past we are now unable to gulp down everything that is offered us, and in a modest way dissent and protest, we are at once accused of trying "to divide the people along the line of wealth."

Mr. Speaker, nothing is more remote from the intention of the friends of free coinage than to unduly arouse the prejudice of one portion of our people against another. This is the country of the rich and poor alike. We do not pretend that any law or system of laws can ever be devised by the wisdom or ingenuity of man which will fully equalize human conditions. We will have the poor always among us. No scheme of fiatism, no plan of the visionary enthusiast, could be invented that would make every man rich.

Industry, economy, and thrift, under equal laws, will produce their own beneficent results, while idleness, extravagance, and want of energy will surely be followed by poverty and misery. But it is the province of a great republic to enact equitable and wholesome legislation, under the operations of which an equal chance is afforded to all men for the acquisition and enjoyment of the benefits of a free government. No injustice can result from the free coinage of silver—no man will have any right to complain at such an enactment—while restriction and suspension are illogical and unfair, and can only produce dissatisfaction among the people. Let us "be just and fear not." I now yield the remainder of my time to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, instead of suspending the coinage of silver, as recommended by the President, I think we ought to have as free and unlimited coinage of that metal as we have of gold. Both metals had free mintage in this country previous to 1873, and they must have it again before there can be any permanent return of prosperity. I boldly assert:

First. That the fierce crusade against silver in this country and Europe for the last twelve years has been simply a huge conspiracy between bondholders and stockholders in our national banks of issue against taxpayers, debtors, laborers, and producers.

Second. That this great Government of ours struck silver its first staggering blow in 1873 and has continued to strike it with an assassin's hand every since, notwithstanding our country mines nearly half the silver of the universe, and our people are actually suffering for money to carry on their industries.

Third. That the unrelenting persecution of silver has been the prime cause of the almost universal depression of business in this country and in several nations abroad since 1873, while at the same time it has been the main factor in the phenomenal progress and prosperity of India, China, and other semi-barbarous states that use only silver as legal tender.

To make good these charges is the task I have given myself to-day. Let us begin by inquiring what motive could prompt bondholders generally and stockholders in our national banks particularly to enter into an alliance offensive and defensive against silver?

MOTIVE FOR DEMONETIZING SILVER.

The time, the occasion, and the manner of beginning and prosecuting the war all testify that cold, calculating avarice was and is at the bottom of it—the bondholders, to double the value of their bonds by increasing the purchasing power of the interest and principal as they are paid; the stockholders of national banks, to supplant silver with their bills, for the circulation of which latter in this country there soon will be no room unless either silver or greenbacks, or both, shall be deprived of the money function, or unless the balance of trade shall steadily set against us and cause the exportation of coin.

When England demonetized silver in 1816 she had just emerged victoriously from the Napoleonic wars, which had lasted for a quarter of a century and had added $3,221,000,000 to her bonded debt, or $440,000,000 more than our civil-war debt.

So, too, when Germany demonetized silver in 1871 she had just conquered France and levied a cash tribute of $1,000,000,000 besides the expenses of the war from her fallen foe. Although Germany, comparatively speaking, owed no public debt then, and owes none now, and although the several states or duchies comprising the empire owe no public debt except what they have public property, such as railways, telegraphs, mines, &c., sufficient to pay, and although Germany has a large portion of the French indemnity either hoarded in gold at one of her fortresses or invested at interest in bonds to accumulate year by year a future war fund, still Germany holds over two thousand millions of bonds due by foreign governments and corporations, the interest and principal of which her capitalists desired to appreciate by making them payable only in gold.

So, likewise, nobody seriously thought of demonetizing silver in the United States until after our great civil war when the Government owed a bonded debt of $2,773,000,000, about half of which still remains unpaid. Was it a mere coincidence that England, Germany, and the United States should have severally declared a crusade against silver immediately after each had victoriously ended a great war, and had added about $3,000,000,000 to the public debts of each of two of them—England and the United States—and about one thousand millions of bonds or assets to the credits of the other?

Men are governed by self-interest, and as all monetary valuations are based upon gold and silver, and as there are about as many silver dollars in the world now as gold dollars, upon the generally received ratio that a given quantity of gold is worth fifteen and a half times as much as its own weight in silver, is it any wonder that bondholders should strive to double the value of their bonds by demonetizing silver, thereby destroying half the means of the people to pay the bonds, and to the same extent increasing the purchasing power of gold?

The annual interest on our war debt to-day is nearly $50,000,000, to say nothing of the principal of the debt, and when silver was demonetized in 1873 that annual interest was above $100,000,000. Besides, the holders of these war bonds were re-enforced by the owners of several thousand millions of State, city, county, corporation, and individual bonds in this country.

In addition to this, every civilized nation except Germany may be said to owe a large bonded debt, and the total national public debts of the world are estimated by many reliable authorities to amount to $24,000,000,000, and municipal, corporate, and private debts are estimated to aggregate at least as much more, and some computers think twice as much. To increase the value of the income from this vast indebtedness may fairly be suspected to have inspired the bondholding class all over the world for the last twelve years to fight silver as a money metal of unlimited legal tender.

Assume that the total bonded debt of the nations is only $50,000,000,000, at an average interest of 4 per cent. the annual income of the few thousand owners of these bonds will amount to $2,000,000,000, and if the purchasing power of this can be doubled by demonetizing silver does it not suggest probable motive enough for the concerted and persistent attack on silver as a money metal of unlimited legal tender?

But it does not depend on presumption, since the proof as to what actuated the creditor and fixed-income classes to war on silver since 1873 is unequivocal. It is an undoubted fact that the marvelous quantity of gold and silver extracted from the California and Australia mines is what has likewise contributed to the prolonged "battle of the standards" here and in Europe. The creditor class or bondholding syndicate commenced the battle for fear if they permitted the governments and people to use both metals in payment of debts (although according to the original contract) that money would become too cheap, so they sought to preserve either the existing scale of prices or lower them by reducing the volume of money one-half. Chevalier, the Frenchman, in 1854–'55–'56, published elaborate papers on the subject of demonetizing gold on account of the vast quantity of that metal then in existence and at that time still increasing.

German doctrinaires on the money question (employed no doubt by the bondholders) published several pamphlets about the same time in favor of demonetizing gold, and accordingly in 1857 the German states (then including Austria), where the double-standard system previously prevailed, demonetized gold—observe, gold, not silver—and Holland from the same motive of appreciating the value of the bonds she held against other nations and corporations had likewise demonetized gold in 1847, just ten years before. But these two states soon ascertained that England would not abandon the gold standard, and that therefore if Europe was to be placed upon a single standard of the same metal, not gold but silver must be demonetized, and as the production of gold had rapidly declined after 1856, while the Nevada silver mines after 1860 had commenced yielding, as was alleged and believed, fabulous amounts of the white metal, Chevalier and his associate doctrinaires changed from demanding the demonetization of gold to demanding the demonetization of silver.

A French monetary commission in 1869 and a Dutch monetary commission in 1873 both reported in favor of the general adoption of the single gold standard to prevent the depreciation of money by reason of its superabundance. England, being a large holder of American Government and corporation bonds, united her forces with the money-capital and income classes everywhere, and particularly in the United States, to destroy silver as legal tender because as our bonds were payable in coin they might be legally paid in silver as well as gold. Germany was a large holder of American securities too, and controlled by her creditor and income classes as well as by political considerations which will be mentioned later on, she aboutfaced on the money question by changing from the single silver to the single gold standard. It is true she decreed the change in 1871, but she did not actually commence enforcing it till 1873, and she has not completed it yet, nor do I believe she ever will.

The United States sneakingly followed suit, demonetizing silver in the same year, 1873, and all the nations of Europe either quickly suspended coinage altogether or restricted it in amount, and on state account, and thereby depressed its market value as bullion. Uncoined silver metal immediately began to fall in price, which could not have been otherwise as all coin-money, whether silver or gold, in addition to being a measure of value is value itself, and consequently, like every other commodity, is subject to the same laws of supply and demand. As there was a diminished demand for silver in this case, by reason of restricting or totally suppressing its mintage, bullion-silver had to fall, while twenty-four hundred millions of coin silver remain at par with gold as full legal tender to-day, according to Burchard's careful estimates.

Especially may it be presumed that silver was demonetized in the interest of bondholders and creditors generally as well as of the national banks, if it can be proven that the deed was done here in a stealthy manner in 1873; and that it was so demonetized no one can doubt who has read all the contemporary debates and proceedings of Congress.

SECRETLY DONE HERE.

At the time silver was demonetized in the United States no discussion or agitation of the subject had occurred among our people. It is true that previous to 1873 the Secretary of the Treasury and Comptroller of the Currency had suggested such a thing to Congress, and a bill or two had been introduced into each House on the subject, but it was not regarded seriously as a practical question. There was no gold or silver in circulation, and but a gloomy prospect of any being in circulation for many years. There was no argumentative debate relative to the demonetization of silver in either House of Congress at the session when the act was passed. Only a brief, casual remark was made by Mr. KELLEY and another by Mr. Potter. The title of the bill itself showed that it meant to deceive: "A bill revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, assay offices," &c. It gave no intimation of being a bill to demonetize silver, and even now, when you go to hunt for the law in the Index of the Statutes at Large, or in the proceedings in the Congressional Globe for the details of its passage, you have to look under the head of "Mint," not "Coinage" nor "Silver" nor "Demonetization." What discussion was had in the Senate referred to abrasion and seigniorage, and in the House to salaries, &c., of the officers of the Mint.

As the bill passed the House it provided for the coinage of a subsidiary dollar, which was stricken out in the Senate. This led to a conference committee between the two Houses, which resulted in striking out the subsidiary dollar altogether and providing for the coinage of a trade-dollar, thereby demonetizing the standard dollar of 412½ grains by simply omitting to enumerate it among the list of silver coins.

The conference report to the two Houses was signed by John Sherman, John Scott, and T. F. Bayard, managers on the part of the Senate, and S. Hooper and William L. Stoughton, managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in without any remarks, much less speeches, and it is doubtful if anybody in either House knew the practical effect of the report as adopted, except the men whose names were signed to it and the few others who were in the secret. Messrs. SHERMAN and Bayard, two members of that noted conference committee, were then and are now well-known candidates for the Presidency. They could, no doubt, if they would, tell a great deal of the part the bondholders took in securing the passage of that infamous law which has inflicted more needless distress upon the American people, in my judgment, than any single act ever adopted by Congress. Charity of course will not suspect that either of them made any money by the transaction, or that either sought to further his political ambition by conciliating Wall street; but posterity will undoubtedly accord Mr. SHERMAN the unenviable honor of having been the evil genius—if not the Catiline, of American finance since the war, while it will marvel how Mr. Bayard could always disinterestedly fight on the side of the bondholders against the people; and if internationality had anything to do with the question, posterity would also lament the cruel irony of fate which permitted one of the original conspirators who dethroned silver to control international negotiations for restoring it to legitimate rights. But let us be thankful that silver can and will take care of itself hereafter as regards free coinage and unlimited legal tender, despite all enemies at home or abroad.

But while the act of 1873 commenced the demonetization of silver, the task was not fully completed till the following year by a different set of actors. In June, 1874, a revised edition of the Statutes of the United States was gotten up, on purpose apparently to enable some scoundrel friendly to the bondholders to interpolate two new acts of Congress—one declaring that no silver coin should be legal tender beyond $5; and the other prohibiting any foreign coin, gold or silver, from being a tender in the payment of debts.

These two acts were smuggled through surreptitiously, because, as there was a wheelbarrow full of manuscript of Revised Statutes, no member of the House, except the Committee on Revision having the matter in charge, could verify the fact whether there was new legislation or not, so the House had to take the word of the committee, which repeatedly and publicly declared that there was no new legislation. General Benjamin F. Butler, of the House Committee on Revsion, asserted solemnly that there was "not one word and not one letter" of addition to the old laws. The venerable Judge Poland, another member of the committee, said the same thing, yet the two new acts referred to were found among the statutes after the ratified manuscript had been printed.

The act of 1873 neither demonetized the old silver dollar nor the smaller silver coins of full weight struck prior to 1853, of which large numbers remain in existence, although not then in circulation. As the Constitution provided for the currency of foreign coins of the dollar piece, nine out of ten in use had always been Spanish or Mexican or 5-franc pieces, none of which can circulate here now, after having once constituted the bulk of our silver coin, and would be so again but for the interpolated law, as the Spanish and Mexican silver coins are lighter than ours.

I will not charge Massachusetts with having taken the lead in demonetizing silver, but Boston and New York owned the bulk of the bonds then held in this country, as they do now. A Massachusetts man, Mr. Hooper, a millionaire, engineered the first bill demonetizing silver through Congress, while another Massachusetts man, Caleb Cushing, was one of the three commissioners who prepared the manuscript of the Revised Statutes; and still another Massachusetts man, General B. F. Butler, secured the passage of the two other demonetizing acts through Congress by a misstatement of fact, to put it mildly.

The momentous event that Congress had passed an act on 12th February, 1873, prohibiting the coinage of a full legal-tender silver dollar was soon known and commenced producing a telling effect among bankers and money-changers, who have a sort of free-masonry organization, although it was not generally known by the people until two or three years afterward; nor indeed was it known by President Grant, who approved the act, until eight months after he had signed it.

But one of its most important effects was to depress the market price of silver almost at once. The first demonetizing act was passed on the 12th February, 1873, and silver began to fall in April following, a fact with which Mr. Feer Herzog, one of the delegates from Switzerland to the international monetary conference at Paris in 1878, twitted Mr. Groesbeck, a delegate from the United States. Mr. Wærn, a delegate in the same conference from Norway and Sweden, asserted:

That the adoption of the system of the single gold standard by the states of the Scandinavian Union took place in May, 1873, and was caused by the fall of silver—

Which began the April preceding. At that same conference the Swiss delegate silenced Mr. Groesbeck upon another point. The latter declared that the Bland act, which our Congress passed the 28th February, 1878, remonetizing silver but restricting its coinage, had been prompted in respect to its "restrictive" feature by the decision of the Latin Union, saying:

From the moment that the countries which had themselves maintained the double standard shut their gates to silver it became necessary, in order to maintain the equilibrium, not to open wide those of the American Union, but to hold back in order to obtain by international agreement the restoration of free coinage in all countries at the same time.

To which Mr. Herzog replied in effect that the United States showed its hostility to silver before the Latin Union did, adding:

As far as related to the influence excited by the decisions of the Latin Union, concerning the limitation of the coinage of silver upon the decision of the United States, to the same effect that the American law of 1873 had been passed in April (12th February), at the time the fall of silver began, while the conference of the Latin Union in which it was decided that the coinage of 5-franc silver pieces should be restricted, did not meet till the close of the year.

In that same conference Mr. Groesbeck likewise admitted that the United States had demonetized silver in 1873 by "inadvertence," insisting that—

A considerable number of members of Congress had confessed to him that at the time the decision was made in 1873 they had not known what they were doing; and that the American people had never been asked whether they wished silver to remain a legal tender; that no newspaper had called attention to the change, nor had any chamber of commerce or board of trade considered or recommended it.

General Walker, another one of our delegates, spoke to the same effect.

Then let no one again attempt to deny the charge that silver was stricken down by fraud in 1873–'74. It is an indisputable fact that even so enlightened and well-equipped a Senator as Mr. Conkling did not know silver had been demonetized as late as 30th March, 1876, more than three years after the foul deed had been done. But what is conclusive that it was done by fraud is the fact that as soon as the people generally found out silver had been demonetized they immediately had it remonetized, but unfortunately with restricted coinage, which had to be accepted to overcome the veto of President Hayes, himself a fraud. As I said before, the demonetization of silver by Germany in 1871–'73 might not have worked any greater harm than the previous demonetization of it by England and Portugal if the United States had not secretly stabbed silver also the same year—1873.

That caused the states of the Scandinavian Union—Denmark, Norway, and Sweden—to demonetize it likewise in the same year of 1873, and the January following all the states of the Latin Union—France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, Greece, &c.—restricted the coinage, and in 1878 suspended it altogether in response seemingly to our miserable half-way measure of limiting coinage to two millions a month. Holland and all the other states of Europe speedily followed suit in prohibiting the free coinage of silver after our folly in 1873.

UNITED STATES FIRST NATION TO HELP GERMANY STRIKE DOWN SILVER.

I think it can safely be assumed if the United States had not demonetized silver in 1873–'74 in all probability no other nation in Europe except Germany would have done it up to this time. I believe it can also be conjectured with equal truth that if the United States had not restricted the coinage of silver when they remonetized it in 1878 there would now be free coinage in every state of Europe, except, perhaps, England, Portugal, and Germany.

I say this because from the time of Abraham silver alone, or in connection with gold upon a fixed ratio, has been a money metal of unlimited coinage and legal tender throughout the world, until England in 1816 and Portugal (an English dependency) in 1854 demonetized it, and the demonetization of it by those two nations except for token-coin had but little depressing effect on the uncoined metal elsewhere, because the other nations utilized the silver discarded by England and Portugal to supply the place of the extra gold appropriated by those two countries for coinage purposes.

Germany, too, might have rejected silver in 1873 without producing any appreciable fall in its commercial value, owing to the strong popularity of the metal as a coin with the masses of other nations, if the United States, the largest silver producer on the globe, had not, as I have shown, also surreptitiously demonetized it in the same year of 1873, without discussion or warning, which struck terror into the business and financial world by the awful crash of 1873, from which it has not yet recovered. As a natural consequence silver soon began to fall, or rather gold began to rise in value, which it has done ever since.

Three extraordinary causes combined to impel Germany to degrade silver to the rank of only token money in 1873. First, she wished to increase the value of the more than two thousand millions of bonds that her capitalists held against foreign nations and corporations, and as she had the single silver standard at the time she concluded she would accomplish her object better by adopting the single gold standard, because it was published and believed that the Comstock lode in Nevada would soon flood the world with silver. Second, she desired to consolidate her empire by melting down all coin emblems of local state sovereignty and substituting therefor new ones from the imperial mint. Third, she sought to crush forever her hereditary enemy—France.

On the other hand, France by restricting and finally suspending silver coinage saw her opportunity to thwart Germany and yet get an abundant supply of silver at the same time, whenever she might want it, either for use in the arts or for coinage, on account of the state, and thereby acquire a large profit in seigniorage. She and the other states of the Latin Union, except Italy, having an ample supply of silver already refined and coined on the basis of 15½ to 1, by suspending further coinage of the white metals showed that they preferred not only to retain their supply of gold, but also to keep their silver coin intact and at par with gold. So that while they have all the silver coin they want, our folly lets them likewise get all the silver bullion they need in the arts 25 per cent. cheaper than silver coin.

The Scandinavian states, and in fact every other nation in Europe, even those that have the single silver standard, have likewise stopped the free coinage of silver, simply because they see the profit in coining only on government account to make the seigniorage or difference between the market value of silver bullion and the legal-tender value of silver coin at the ratio of 15½ to 1, which prevails all over Europe.

IF FREE COINAGE IS SUSPENDED MORE SILVER IS COINED IN THE WORLD NOW THAN IS MINED.

It is true free coinage of silver by the citizen is not permitted now anywhere except in India, Mexico, and most of the Spanish-American states, yet there was more silver coined in the world during the five years 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883 than was mined out of the ground in the same length of time. This fact, which will astonish some of the learned orators and writers on the silver question, is abundantly established by the reports of the Director of the Mint for the years 1882 and 1884, as the following tables will show:

* Coinage for 1876, 1877, and 1878, to March 31, 1879; no coinage executed since 1879. † Approximate.

From these tables it appears that for the five years in question the aggregate production and coinage of silver in the whole world, was as follows:

Year.	Production.	Coinage.
1879	$96,172,628	$104,888,313
1880	94,521,060	82,397,154

Many other curious facts relating to the aggregate amount of silver produced and coined during the same five years by ten different nations are as follows:

Country.	Silver bullion produced in five years, 1879-1883.	Silver coined in five years, from 1879-1883.	Excess of production over coinage.
United States	$215,012,132	$140,131,168	$74,876,964

Country.	Production.	Coinage.	Excess of coinage over production.

Great Britain		18,453,270	18,453,270
Spain	15,481,100	24,544,418	9,063,311

First. The first thing that commands notice is that the United States during the five years in question coined all the silver our home mines produced except $74,876,964, or about an annual average of $15,000,000 which could easily have been coined without resulting in any appreciable effect upon our currency except to strengthen it.

Second. The second noticeable fact is that Mexico coined nearly as much silver as the United States, if we make allowance that she coined none at all one year. She still coins it, mostly for the China trade.

Third. A third thing that strikes the observer is that during the five years India alone, although producing no silver herself, coined more of the metal than the United States, and it may be also remarked that the year the United States only partially remonetized silver, to wit, 1878, India coined $78,741,556, and during the year preceding that $30,518,415, or a total of $109,259,981 in two years, making an aggregate of $252,380,105 in seven years.

Fourth. Great Britain coined $18,453,270 during the period mentioned, or more than three millions a year; yet my colleague [Mr. HEMPHILL] said in his silver-suspension speech the other day that England "has not indulged in coining silver for near a century." If my colleague had examined more carefully he would have found that England has coined an average of about $3,000,000 silver yearly since 1858. He might also have ascertained that under Sir Robert Peel's act of 1844 the Bank of England is allowed to keep one-fourth of all its specie reserves in silver. According to the report of the Director of the Mint for 1885, England coined $3,204,824 in the year 1884.

Fifth. While it is generally believed that Germany has discarded silver altogether, she, too, coined $7,001,621 in the five-year period referred to, and it is a further fact that she not only stopped selling or recoining her large stock of old silver in 1879 but she remonetized it by making it full legal tender again. Even token-silver in Germany is full legal tender to the government for any amount.

Sixth. Austria, Spain, and Japan strained every nerve to coin all the silver they could buy at its depreciated bullion price, besides the $30,784,429 which they produced at home and coined on account of the state to make the seigniorage profit for the government.

Seventh. Mexico, Bolivia, and Chili produced in the five years considerably more silver than the United States, and it is well known that England controls most of the commerce not only of those silver-producing states, but of nearly all the other South American republics, and as she has the ships to transport the commerce of the East she almost has a monopoly of the silver yielded by the states south of us to manipulate the trade of China and India to suit herself, while we look on in helpless imbecility. It is true that Mexico coins most of her silver at home, but England gets it mainly for profitable trade with China, where the Mexican dollar is a legal tender alongside of the sycee.

Eighth. Germany, Austria, and Spain are the silver-producing nations of Europe. Austria has the single silver standard of value, while Spain has the double standard, and as Germany had the single silver standard too before she demonetized the white metal in 1873, she may go back to silver again, since she is already the fifth silver-producing nation, and the yield of her mines, which are the property of the state, is largely and steadily increasing every year. She can change from one standard of value to the other with great facility. We have seen that in 1857 she adopted the single silver standard, yet fourteen years afterward she changed to the single gold standard, partly because she believed the Munchausen tales told about the fabulous quantities of silver in the Comstock lode and thought as she had nearly all of France's gold she could keep it. Besides, Germany has lately inaugurated a grand colonization policy, having annexed to her empire large areas of land, amounting to over 400,000 square miles, in several different quarters of Africa and the Pacific Ocean, which are well peopled with barbarians, and she will need vast sums of silver, as will France and Belgium, to trade with these new subjects, and a wide field of prosperity opens up to the colonizing nation that has plenty of silver.

IT IS COINED BY GOVERNMENTS TO MAKE THE SEIGNORAGE.

In any event the bold, cold, monumental fact remains that in spite of the general assault against silver in 1873, which occurred when the United States followed Germany's lead in deposing the metal, it is still sought after and coined as much as ever, even more than ever, because the metal is cheaper than it has been since the dawn of history compared with gold, but not cheaper when compared with other things.

This supposed cheapness may explain why so much of it has been coined of late by parties owning plate, ornaments, &c., becoming apprehensive of a further fall and rushing to sell; or it may arise from the nations that have gold preferring to purchase silver at depressed market rates for coinage on state account, thereby gaining the fat seigniorage and then making the silver coin practically full legal tender with gold, as will be shown presently. Such a proceeding has often been practiced by dishonest governments, and why not now when half the nations of Europe are groaning under debt? Be the cause what it may, I repeat only private free coinage of silver is suspended abroad as it is here, and it has been suspended there only because we first set the example as an ally of Germany. Coinage on government account, as I have conclusively proven, goes on as much as ever, and whether most of the silver coin thus minted be only token money, like our fractional silver pieces, with a large per cent. of less pure silver than standard coin, and be a legal tender in law for only a limited sum, yet such silver is generally circulating abroad among the people as if it were gold. This is especially true not merely of those nations that have the double standard, but also of those that have the single gold standard, with silver as token money, and it is likewise true of those that, like the United States, have the limping standard of unlimited gold and restricted silver coinage.

The reports of the Director of the Mint prove that the states of the Latin Union keep eight hundred millions of silver, eleven hundred millions of gold, and one thousand millions of paper afloat, all at par. The states of the Scandinavian union—Denmark, Norway, and Sweden—although nominally only gold monometallic as to full legal tender, likewise keep ten millions silver, twenty-seven millions gold, and forty-four millions of paper "interchangeably at par with gold." In Holland, Spain, and other double-standard states the three kinds of money, including large sums of silver and gold, are also held at par. Even in Germany over two hundred millions of silver and three hundred millions each of gold and paper "in usual business transactions are taken indiscriminately in payment without discount or premium either on metal or paper currency." In Austria, Japan, Mexico, and other states, however, which have only the single silver standard, while silver and paper are at par and full legal tender, gold is merely a commodity and at a premium of over 20 per cent. Showing that gold has appreciated as metal, while silver has not depreciated below par either as coin or metal.

Now, if the great nations of Europe, where no private free coinage of silver is permitted, and in fact where no silver is coined except by the government as with us, can keep silver and gold interchangeably at par for any debt, especially where silver is full legal tender by law for either public or private obligations, as it is with us, why can not we do it if the administration would observe the law in good faith? As the value of everything depends upon the uses to which it can be put, and as silver and gold are used for only two purposes—first, the arts; second, for coinage—when silver is deprived in a great measure of its most important function, to wit, coinage, by restrictive laws limiting either the amount of its coinage or the extent of its legal tender, need any one be at a loss to account for the decline of the commercial value of silver and the rise of that of gold? Allow free trade in coinage and unlimited legal tender to both metals, as existed before 1873, and as sure as the sun rises and sets silver will soon be at par with gold again at our ratio of 16 to 1.

LAW MORE THAN COMMERCE MAKES MONEY.

Money is both property and an institution, being an official measure of value as well as a certified quantity of value itself for the exchange of services and commodities, and for the payment of debts and damages to individuals and fines and taxes to the state. The central idea of money is its property value as recognized by the state, and the best money is gold or silver having full market value as well as full legal-tender value for any amount. So that commerce and law unite to create this best money, whereas law alone confers legal-tender power on any sort of money.

In fact law has much more to do with conferring value on gold and silver money even than commerce has, because it is law alone that imparts the legal-tender or debt and tax paying attribute to coin. How much superior law is to commerce in attaching value to coin may be seen in the circumstance that our present trade-dollar of 420 grains standard silver can not pay a debt or tax as a matter of right, whereas the Bland dollar of only 412½ grains standard silver can pay either, simply because the law confers the power of legal tender on one but not on the other. It may be still further illustrated in the case of the Bland or standard dollar, which, by virtue of having only 371¼ grains of fine silver coined, will yet pay for nearly a fourth more equally fine silver metal uncoined.

To prove yet more convincingly that law, more than commerce, determines the market value of the money-metals, Mr. Thomas Baring, one of the chiefs of the large banking house of Baring Brothers & Co., testified before Parliament that in London during the financial crisis of 1847 it was impossible to borrow a guinea of gold on 60,000 pounds of sterling coined silver. He also bore witness that in the commercial panic at Calcutta in 1864 a merchant could not borrow a single rupee of silver upon 20,000 pounds of coined gold as collateral. Why was this? Mainly for the reason that silver in London was not a legal tender above 40 shillings, while gold in Calcutta was not legal tender for any sum whatever. Owing to these facts many merchants had to go into bankruptcy in both cities at the crises indicated, which would not have been the case if both metals had been legal tender.

Numerous other things could be mentioned to show that law, and not trade, is the main factor in determining the legal-tender value of any money; but let it suffice to say that law, and nothing but law, makes a greenback dollar in the United States as good legal tender as a gold dollar for everything except customs duties and payment of interest on the public debt. And they would have answered for those two purposes as well as the coin if the money-changers, who are now fighting silver as well as greenbacks, had not improperly influenced the small Senate in 1862 to dishonor the Treasury note to enable Gresham's law to operate. There was a time when both Mexican and Spanish silver coins and gold doubloons, &c., constituted the bulk of our metallic money, because both the Constitution and the act of Congress provided the law which made them legal tender; but since the demonetization act of 1874 depriving foreign coin of that privilege, no one ever sees the pillars of Hercules or the rising sun on coin nowadays. Yet the legal-tender quality of money, whether coin or paper, is altogether local, and confined within the boundaries of the nation issuing it, while the commercial value, apart from the legal tender, remains nearly the same in all countries at all times.

Except where the citizen prefers to have the actual coin, which is not often, the Government ought to guard the coin in some safe depository and have it represented by a paper certificate in the hands of the public. Most people do not care to carry either much gold or silver, and there would be no trouble or expense about circulating the surplus silver now in the Treasury if coin certificates were issued for it and those certificates paid out for interest or principal of the national debt or for the current expenses of the Government. At present no silver certificate can be issued even by law for a less amount than $10. Let one, two, and five dollar certificates be sent forth and they will be as popular as the greenbacks of those denominations; indeed, they ought to be more so, as they would represent coin as well as the good faith and responsibility of the Government, which former the greenbacks would not do if the Federal Government, from war, short crops, overtrading, panic, &c., should suspend specie payment.

So that all the pretended difficulty and cost of keeping the silver, or rather its equivalent certificate, in circulation is mere subterfuge. Even now, with no certificate allowed by law under $10, the silver could easily be kept afloat if the Treasury officials would do their duty and observe their oaths by redeeming payable bonds or discharging other obligations of the Government with silver and taking the silver back immediately into the Treasury for certificates, which are legal tender for every debt, public or private. But the Secretary of the Treasury is too good a friend of the national banks to remember that he is the sworn officer and agent of sixty million people. Having determined the best kind of money, gold and silver or their equivalent certificate, let us next consider the quantity of the article a nation ought to possess if possible.

QUANTITY OF MONEY NECESSARY.

Mr. Calhoun estimated it at about one-thirtieth the total wealth of the community and that every inhabitant ought to have for his share between $30 and $35. Many persons may question the soundness of this rule, but it is sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes; and although the requisite amount of money for a healthy circulating medium depends upon many other things besides population, yet the per capita is the best single guide. Tested by that, on the basis that our population is fifty-eight or sixty millions and that it is desirable to substitute gold and silver or their equivalent certificates for greenbacks and national-bank bills, we could easily absorb a thousand millions more gold and silver without the slightest fear of letting Gresham's much-talked-of but little understood law use silver to expel gold.

It would probably require twenty years or more to obtain this additional thousand millions coin, and at the end of that time our population would number over 80,000,000, needing at least one and a half billions coin for business alone, to say nothing of the arts. Therefore is it not like a child seeing a hobgoblin in the dark to be fearing the possession of too much money—honest money at that—God Almighty's money, and not man's lying rags. So let us be thankful that the time is a good way off before our children shall possess more of the precious metals than they will want. There is not the remotest danger of our being burdened with more than we can carry. If perchance we should at any time accumulate more than our "fair share" of the world's gold and silver we could not keep it long, because prices would then go above their proper level, imports would increase, exports diminish; and we should have to send coin abroad to settle balances with the foreigner. Then, too, if either gold or silver coin should become too plentiful and depreciate in value, the arts would find it out and appropriate much of both metals for watches, jewelry, plate, &c.

France, which has twenty millions fewer people than we have, has largely more money than we possess. She carries over fifty dollars to the inhabitant without any complaint of redundancy, and her money is in circulation among the people, where it is hoarded in a million different stockings and private places, ready for use as wanted, instead of being locked up, as with us, in a few national-bank vaults and in our Federal Treasury to forcibly reduce the volume of money afloat and depress business with a view to compel Congress to retire greenbacks and discard silver as coin, in order to make room for national-bank bills as the only means of relieving financial distress in the country.

France not only has more money per capita than any nation in the world, but she is confessedly the best governed nation as regards her finances. She paid Germany a nearly cash war indemnity of $1,000,000,000 in gold, yet by substituting silver for it and issuing large quantities of government notes to keep her domestic industries prosperous she soon got back her gold, whereas Germany by dethroning silver could only partially fill its place with gold, thereby gaining no advantage and actually losing heavily by the transaction. France cut the costly Suez Canal, you may say, without missing the money, and she is now digging the Panama Canal at an expense of two or three hundred millions; yet she still has plenty of money to carry on wars in the East and leave her people in possession of more coin than the United States and England or the United States and Germany jointly possess. She believes in supplying her people with all the money they can use to advantage and never hesitates to issue government treasury notes through the Bank of France by the hundred millions when necessary, either to relieve a crisis or equip her laborers and men of enterprise with sufficient financial tools.

Hence everybody in France has the heart to work at all times. That is the secret of the tireless energy of the people and of their splendid economy. Pecuniary distress and consequent business stagnation do not brood over that land on account of too much money like it does over ours on account of too little. Besides, the French people are their own bankers. They have but one bank of issue, which is really the government, although it is nominally called the Bank of France. Nor have the French even a single trust bank; and therefore it is they have no foreign colony of defaulting bank officers as we have in Canada.

The French believe in free trade, not monopoly, in money, in letting the individual not a corporation control it. As a nation they are like the New York merchant the other day who when he made a hundred-thousand-dollar purchase got the money out of his iron safe, and in answer to the surprise expressed at his not having deposited it in a bank, replied, as between the banks and burglars "I will risk the burglars." France's favorite financial maxim is: "There is no companion like money," and coin-money at that. This national trait of hoarding coin was what saved the nation from destruction in the German war. Suppose France's money system had then been mostly on the rag basis, how could she have ever paid the German gold tribute and gotten rid of the conquering army? France does not like the English and American idea of cheap money—convertible paper—because when trouble comes, and sometimes come it must, there is no coin to convert with. It has run away—nothing being so cowardly as $1,000,000 of gold except two millions of gold. Hence, the difference between the French idea of finance and that of the American and English is that the latter strive to see how little real money or coin they can get along with while the French strive to see how much they can get and keep, believing it is better to lose the interest than interest and principal both.

The bills of the Bank of France correspond to our greenbacks, and they are as good as gold because they are a legal tender for any debt or tax. Our greenbacks, on the other hand, are not as good as gold, because they are not a legal tender either for duties on imports or for interest on the public debt, and the same class of men who thus discredited our Treasury notes in 1862, to let Gresham's law exalt the value of coin and degrade that of greenbacks, are endeavoring now to up with gold and down with silver.

SUPPLY OF MONEY SHOULD BE STABLE.

If there is anything that ought always to be stable and never alter by increase or diminution in value it is the volume of money in a country, except so far as it may be enlarged or reduced by the natural laws of supply and demand, in exchanges as well as to allow for the annual increase or decrease of population. A healthy volume of money depends not on the material out of which it is made, and not on the cost of its production, but on the cost of obtaining it after it has been produced and on the functions it can perform, as well as on the limitation of its quantity. A dollar ought to be the same in value both when a contract is made and when it is paid, although twenty years may intervene, and gold and silver come nearer to this uniform standard than any substances in the world.

BOTH PRECIOUS METALS MORE STEADY THAN ONLY ONE.

As regards paper money, either individuals, corporations, or governments may be tempted to issue too much and thereby depreciate it. But the supply of precious metals from the mines is for the most part steady, especially as regards the sum of both metals. Sometimes there is an abnormal yield of one, then of the other, but, on the average, the aggregate is the best regulator of the money supply—just as two metals of unequal expansion form the best mainspring of a chronometer, or just as two separate reservoirs of water which are connected with each other by a pipe, but are fed by streams of unequal capacity, will always have the same level with only slight fluctuations.

Besides, there is more fixedness of value in two metals than one when a proper ratio is observed and free coinage allowed, because as one metal becomes commercially less valuable than the other there is such a general demand for it to pay debts that the equilibrium is soon restored by the appreciated metal having risen only half as high as it would have done if there had been but one metal, and by the depreciated metal having fallen only half as low as it would have fallen if there had been but one metal. They act and react on each other, preventing any violent fluctuations such as are incidental to the paper money put forth by banks of issue. We already possess thousands of these shaving shops in our national banks that are depressing business and robbing the public every day by expanding or contracting the currency through establishing new banks or failures and liquidation of old ones to suit the interest of stockholders, not that of the public.

MEN WHO DEAL IN MONEY OUGHT NOT TO MAKE IT.

Men who deal in money brokerage as a business ought not to be permitted to make paper money. That ought to be done by the sovereign government alone, which should act for the good of all, not for the benefit of a few. Until we can accumulate gold and silver enough for our circulating medium the only kind of paper money we ought to have is the greenback, which is stable in value because it is a fixed quantity—a quality wholly unknown to national-bank bills.

Moreover, the most important difference between a national-bank note and the note of a solvent private individual is that the bank note draws interest while the individual note pays interest, all by virtue of the bank's chartered privilege from the Government to issue in money-notes 90 per cent. of the amount of the bonds on which the notes are based, and yet collect interest from the Government on the bond as though it were not security for money-bills in circulation. When an equal amount of stable greenbacks could be put into circulation without costing the people anything, it is too bad to force them to pay interest on the national-bank bills that are increased or diminished every day, to the great detriment of the public,

Above all it is too bad to have this many-headed national-bank monster striving to extend its nefarious system of control over the money of the country by first canceling the three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks and then stopping the coinage of silver so as to substitute national-bank rags in their stead while charging the people interest on the people's own credit, and expanding or contracting the volume of money ad libitum. Yet that is what our Wall street President, national-bank Secretary of the Treasury, and bondholding-syndicate administration are attempting to do.

The President, in his eagerness to serve Wall street bondholders and national-bank stockholders by suspending the coinage of silver, substantially says in his annual message that our silver dollar, which has the same quantity of pure silver in it now that it has had ever since 1792, is an unsound dollar, a depreciated dollar, a dishonest dollar, which, if its coinage be not suspended, will, according to Gresham's law, drive all the gold out of the country, and make the United States the "dumping-ground" of silver for all the world. He also says that to pay debts with such dollars is repudiation, and not only injures the wealthy creditor class but also the poor, and especially the laborer. In support of these grave charges no pertinent facts are presented in the message, but many unfounded facts are assumed, some wailing prophecies are indulged, and the following quotation from Webster's speech in the Senate in 1834 is cited:

> The very man of all others who has the deepest interest in a sound currency and who suffers most by mischievous legislation in money matters, is the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil.

I heartily indorse this sentiment, and it is because I indorse it that I oppose the suspension of silver coinage and favor its unlimited coinage. As regards silver our "mischievous legislation" consists first in having demonetized silver altogether in 1873; and second, in restricting its coinage in 1878 instead of restoring it to unlimited coinage. No laborer objects to taking a silver dollar for his wages. The only thing he complains of is that he can not get enough of them or of their equivalent certificates on account of their scarcity by reason of the administration's Wall street policy of hoarding all kinds of money by the national Treasury in the interest of the bondholders and national banks.

GRESHAM'S LAW.

Now, what is Gresham's law about which so many gentlemen have talked so much? It is evident that some writers and speakers who discourse dogmatically of Gresham's law do not understand it.

The usual definition or explanation is that where there are two moneys of different value the less valuable will drive the more valuable out of circulation. The Greek poet, Aristophanes, first wrote of this law of finance; but as an English merchant by the name of Gresham in Queen Elizabeth's time published a good deal about it, his name was given to it. The best test of any money is the extent to which it will pay debts or taxes, and any money, whether coin or paper, that can by authority of law pay every public tax or private debt is as good as gold, because gold can do no more than that. Either the Government or a private creditor has the right to refuse any money except it has full legal-tender quality, which law alone can confer.

At present we have four kinds of money—gold, silver, greenbacks, and national-bank bills—which are ordinarily received at par in business, but only gold and silver are above the reach of Gresham's law, because the precious metals are all the money we have that is legal tender for duties on imports or interest on the public debt. Except for the two purposes just named greenbacks are a full legal tender for every debt, public or private, whereas national-bank bills, in addition to not being a legal tender for either of said purposes, are likewise not a tender for the redemption of greenbacks or for a private debt due by one citizen to another. So that if the parties entitled to receive the money object, there are four kinds of contracts national-bank bills can not discharge, and two kinds that greenbacks can not meet; but inasmuch as national-bank bills are redeemable in greenbacks, and greenbacks themselves redeemable in coin, our four species of money are all at par, and have been since January, 1879.

But how long could the two paper moneys remain so if anything should occur like a great war, short crops, adverse balances of trade, or a financial crisis to force the Government to suspend specie payment? The moment the Government ceased to redeem the greenbacks in coin, while yet requiring that all customs duties and interest on the public debt should be paid in coin, that moment Gresham's law, which so delights the money-changer's heart, would be set in motion to run riot in all sorts of speculation, by buying one kind of money with another kind. The Government must have coin to meet the interest on its public debt, and the merchant also must secure coin to pay duties on imports. Therefore the holders of the coin would not part with it except at a premium in either greenbacks or national-bank bills, which two latter being the cheaper money would drive the dearer coin out of general circulation, because everybody that had gold or silver would withhold it for a rise in price, payable in bank bills or greenbacks, which would be the only money in common use.

This was the case from the second year of the war up to January 1, 1879, a period of seventeen years, during all which time Gresham's law never enjoyed such a triumphant and desolating reign over private property and both public and private morals in the history of the United States, all caused by Congress not having made greenbacks a full legal tender for customs duties and for interest on the public debt as well as for every other tax or debt. Had that been done the greenback would have kept at or near par with gold and silver even while the war lasted, because its quantity was strictly limited and it was convertible into interest-bearing bonds whenever the holder asked it. Instead of that a gold exchange was opened in New York solely for gambling purposes. Fortunes were made and lost every day by buying or selling gold or silver or greenbacks, and speculation, extravagance, dissipation, and demoralization ran riot. The enemies of silver are pretending that if its coinage be not suspended there will soon be another agonizing era of the Gresham nuisance, but their anxiety is only feigned or is the result of self-delusion. A very few may honestly believe it, but the great majority long to see a revival of the opportunity to speculate in moneys of unequal value, and that is why they seek to degrade one of the precious metals by buying it with the other instead of buying commodities with both metals.

National-bank bills are plenty good enough money for the enemies of silver. No danger, they say, of Gresham's law getting a chance to work in respect to our present bank rags, and even the President, while denouncing silver—one of the moneys mentioned in the Bible, one of the moneys guaranteed by the Constitution, can say: "The very limited amount of circulating notes issued by our national banks, compared with the amount the law permits them to issue upon a deposit of bonds for their redemption, indicates that the volume of our circulating medium may be largely increased through this instrumentality."

DEMOCRACY BELIEVES IN HARD MONEY.

Shades of Benton and Jackson and Calhoun, and all the hard-money Democratic fathers, what next when a Democratic President, so called, can recommend national-bank bills while denouncing silver? That, too, when the banks can increase or decrease the issue of money according to their interest and not for the public good. It was against the abuse of this sovereign power of issuing or contracting money that Mr. Webster delivered the speech from which the President quoted. Let me also ask the Clerk to read another extract from Webster on the relative merits of rag and silver money, delivered in the Senate in 1832:

Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effective than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effective of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow.

The President not only prefers national-bank paper money to silver, but it is a legitimate inference that he likewise prefers a "flexible" to a stable money, a variable, changeable quantity of circulating medium, governed only by the self-interest of those who issue it, instead of by considerations for the public good. My colleague [Mr. HEMPHILL] stands in the same category. In his ingenious but fallacious speech favoring the suspension of silver coinage he denounced greenbacks and national-bank bills because they had no "intrinsic" or commercial value, and were therefore liable to Gresham's law. To be consistent he ought to prefer silver to paper, as he professes to desire only commercial value in money apart from its legal tender value. As the paper is worth nothing in itself, while he admits the silver dollar is worth 80 cents in gold, he ought to stand by silver according to his argument of taking the best money in a commercial sense that the material of the money costs.

It was to guard against "flexible" money that Webster pleaded so eloquently, and it is the horrible recollection of assignats, as well as John Law's Mississippi bubble, that causes the French to have no paper money issued except by the government, and it is even said that the origin of the French proverb that "A scalded cat dreads cold water" grew out of the prolonged sufferings which resulted from too much "flexibility" in the currency. Ought not we Americans to have equally as lively a recollection of Continental money, confederate money, and the wagon-loads of shinplasters and paper frauds that circulated in this country before the war, when each of the thirty-odd State Legislatures was a factory to charter wild-cat banks of issue to deceive and rob the people, first by expanding money to get them in debt and second by contracting it to force them to pay, as our national banks are doing now.

Before the war almost any State Legislature in the Union would grant a charter to any set of sharpers who would ask it to set up a bank to make paper money, and about all required was for the bank bill to promise to pay specie (provided no body called for it). Bondholders, national-bank stockholders, even our Wall-street President, are all trying to degrade the silver dollar by pretending that it is not a legal tender for the interest or principal of the public debt, but their unpatriotic, dishonest efforts are all in vain. The silver dollar will pay any debt that gold will pay, because it is full legal tender by law, and the world knows the law if our national-bank Secretary of the Treasury does not.

American-coined silver passes at par with coined gold abroad except the difference of exchange (freight, insurance, interest, and the usual small brokerage). Our Bland dollars, as they are derisively called, sell every day in London for par in gold, less exchange, and this is, or ought to be, a convincing illustration that law makes the value of money more than commerce.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] tells us that if any portion of the public debt be paid in silver gold will immediately retire in disgust from circulation. Well, let it retire. Silver can now pay any debt or any tax that gold can pay, and that being the case, neither silver nor greenbacks will ever hunt gold up at a premium like poor greenbacks once had to do to pay customs and interest on the public debt. Gold will not sulk long when it can neither command a premium nor interest, but, like Achilles, shall come forth again asking employment.

Almost every government in Europe has abolished private banks of issue, and have no paper money other than national treasury notes like our greenbacks, except that they are legal tender for every debt or tax. Hence, as a rule, they keep on a par with coin, partly from the great demand for them to pay heavy taxes, which is equivalent to a redemption, and partly from the limitation of the quantity of them. Weston, in his admirable work on money, says:

Nobody ever attributed the continuous depreciation and final worthlessness of the assignats of the French revolution, of the Continental bills of the American Revolution, or of the circulating paper of the Southern Confederate States to anything except enormously excessive issues.

The value of any kind of money depends more on its supply and the demand for it than anything else, and of course making it a legal tender for every sort of debt or tax increases the demand for it to the full capacity of the community to absorb money, which necessarily, within that limit, leaves the regulation of value to supply mostly. But neither silver nor gold bullion can command its full commercial value without it enjoys the privilege of free coinage, because coinage and use in the arts are the only two things that give value to the precious metals, and where the coinage of either metal is suspended or restricted, as is now the case with silver, its commercial value must fall, and in the exact proportion that the other metal will rise because the two metals together constitute the basis of all values, which caused Hamilton, Jefferson, and the fathers of the Constitution to make both metals a legal tender so as to have "the benefits of a full," rather than "the evils of a scanty circulation," as Hamilton expressed it. A government having the population, wealth, enterprise, and integrity of ours ought to be easily able in time of peace to supplement its deficiency of coin by floating at par with gold or silver at least $10 of Treasury notes to the inhabitant. That would give us between six and seven hundred millions of greenbacks, or about as much paper money as we now have, and there would be no expansion, no contraction of the volume of money to raise or lower prices, and no war on silver by wholesale hoarding of all sorts of money in the interest of banks of issue.

Mr. Calhoun says any stable, reliable government can ordinarily hold at par with gold a much larger sum of treasury notes than the total of its aggregate annual taxation.

The total amount of annual taxation in this country—national, State, and municipal—is over $600,000,000, and as that amount of money has to be used once every year to pay taxes, which is virtually a redemption in coin, the Government can surely dispense with all banks of issue and get rid of their expense as well as of their corruption and disturbance of the business of the country. If this were done, with State banks of trust, discount, and deposit, and free coinag of silver, we would soon have both our currency and our industries on a healthy basis of repose and prosperity.

It can not be said too often, if it were possible there ought to be no money in a country except what has both commercial and legal-tender value, circulating in the form of coin, or a representative certificate as preferred by the owner, and while the millennium may get here before that day arrives, let us hasten its coming all we can by a free coinage of silver.

If there is anything in the finances of a country which should be as fixed as the laws of the Medes and Persians, it is the quantity of paper money which should be issued. The varying supply of circulation ought to depend upon the balance of trade, and it should consist of coin, not rags. The only paper money that ought to be allowed is a definite, fixed quantity of Treasury notes, and all other money should be coin, represented by paper certificates, if desired, dollar for dollar. This has been the English system of finance ever since 1844, and it was the system that prevailed at the Bank of Venice for hundreds of years—the admiration of the world.

But while nothing would be easier than for the United States to adopt this almost perfect system of finance at this time, I have but small hope and no expectation that they will do it. The remorseless, selfish, and tyrannical national banks will not permit it, although in the history of the world no nation has ever had such an opportunity as now offers to us for placing our monetary system upon an enduring basis that promises to give us an exclusive coin issue in the not distant future. The plan is very simple. We have only to replace national-bank bills with greenbacks and allow as full coinage of silver as of gold, and the work is done. Time, and no long time at that, will do the rest, with peace, good crops, and good trade. But the reign of Tom Walkers would be over then, the occupation of Shylock would be gone, the people would be too prosperous and happy. So the New England and Eastern Middle States, where the bonds and mortgages against the West and South are held, will prevent it.

The balance of trade, which at last has far more to do with the abundance or scarcity of the precious metals in a country than ratios of gold and silver, Gresham's law, or anything else, has been in our favor for a long while except two or three years. We extract from the bowels of the earth every year about seventy-five millions of the precious metals. If the foreign trade should continue favorable we can not only coin every dollar of this except what may be used in the arts, but we can largely export gold and silver to add to our stock of coin and ornaments. In all probability the excess of imports over exports of both metals would supply the demand for the arts among us.

Besides, if our population increase only 1,000,000 a year we shall need $35,000,000 more annually according to Mr. Calhoun, and $50,000,000 more, according to the experience of France, for the new comers. Then why get alarmed about having too much silver by coining $2,000,000 a month? As long as we have over $600,000,000 of rag money, why should the President say that the coinage of $2,000,000 of silver a month is "beyond the amount needed for a sufficient circulating medium?" Why should he warn us that "the desire to utilize the silver product of the country should not lead to a misuse or the perversion of this power" (to coin money)?

It is a slander to charge that any considerable number of people in this country want silver coined for the exclusive benefit of silver miners, although as they are engaged in a legitimate business they should receive just treatment from the Government by it permitting free coinage of silver to preserve its bullion value. Any other government but ours, no doubt, would encourage its silver mines. We do not properly appreciate the blessings which Providence has bestowed upon us. Several different nations have either valuable gold or silver mines. Ours is the only one that has both gold and silver mines. Yet we do not appreciate it, and are pretending to fear that we shall get too much coin, even while we have more rag money than any nation on earth—more than even Russia. Some people speak of silver as if it were as common as iron and promised to become as cheap on account of its too great abundance.

FOLLY OF FEARING TOO MUCH HARD MONEY.

When school boys we all read about the seven wonders of the world, and never supposed there would be an eighth wonder; but future historians ought to regard it as an eighth wonder that the people of the United States in 1873, when they had neither gold nor silver in circulation, should have determined that they did not want any silver money at all, and that when they did remonetize it again in 1878, from that time until 1886 they restricted its coinage to two millions per month, although during all that while they had considerably over six hundred millions of rag money in circulation and their own silver mines produced about fifteen millions more bullion each year than their Government would coin.

But let us inquire where all this great stock of silver is now, if it be in existence, and if not, where it is to come from.

It is generally estimated that there are about twelve hundred millions of people on the earth, and according to the report of the Director of the Mint for 1884, there are about $10,000,000,000 of money in circulation, leaving out China and several other semi-barbarous states in Asia, Africa, and elsewhere. Of this vast sum, in round numbers, the paper money is $4,000,000,000; gold, $3,250,000,000; silver, $2,750,000,000.

In other words, only about $5 of both gold and silver if each inhabitant had his proportionate share assigned him, or about one-seventh of what Mr. Calhoun and one-tenth of what the French say is the proper sum per capita. It must not be forgotten also that most of the recognized writers on the precious metals conjecture, and they can only conjecture, that about as much gold and silver values are stored up in the arts, in plate, jewelry, ornaments, &c., as exist in coin. Hardly a family, a man, a woman, or child in the civilized world but has some article of use or ornament made out of the precious metals—a piece of plate, a watch, a bracelet, a ring, &c. As the United States at present have about three hundred millions of silver, counting the subsidiary coin, and about sixty million people, we have almost to a mathematical calculation our exact cosmopolitan per capita proportion of $5, and the President does not wish us to have a cent more, notwithstanding we are the largest silver-producing nation and have for each inhabitant over ten dollars' worth of rag money without a dollar of specie behind it. However, after taking this anomalous position the strangest declaration of the President is that "there is certainly not enough silver now in circulation to cause uneasiness."

No, I should think not. The only cause of uneasiness is that there is not more silver or silver certificates afloat, and if what we have is not sufficient to cause "uneasiness," why not try a little more of it, especially as the French have over $15 silver coin per capita and are not bothered about it. Since we shall have to acquire more than $600,000,000 additional silver to possess as much per capita as the French, let us trust in Providence yet awhile and have free coinage like it used to be.

As Burchard's Mint report for 1884, the highest authority we have on the subject, does not know where the alleged superabundance of silver coin or bullion is to be found, let us try to discover where it is to come from in the future.

Only a few more millions of silver are mined every year than of gold, and the doctrine of chances according to past experience forbids the assumption of any excessive yield of silver hereafter. If for the next half century there should be twice as much silver extracted from the earth each year as has been extracted on the average for the last half or quarter of a century, there would be no cause for the friends of silver to tremble. Indeed if there should be ten times as much obtained India and China could take it all and not have half enough. During the last thirty-five years three times as much gold has been taken out of the earth as silver, rated by the usual European ratio, that 15½ pounds of silver are worth as much as 1 pound of gold. So that until very recently, when the annual yield of silver began to exceed that of gold, there was much stronger ground for apprehending a deluge of gold than silver, and there will have to be a largely increasing annual yield of silver for many long years to enable that metal to get as far ahead of gold in quantity again as it was when the California and Australian gold fields were discovered.

The Caucasian world alone, not counting India or China, would like to substitute silver for the four billions of rag money it is now compelled to use, and we could make a profit by mining it, and get par for it too if we permitted free coinage, which is the only method of preserving the bullion value of either gold or silver. Besides, the white race are spreading all over the earth, subduing and civilizing Asia, Africa, and the isles of the Pacific. Population is likely to increase in the next half century as it never increased before. Real, honest money—gold and silver—or even silver alone, then will find some one to be glad to get it at its present legal-tender ratio, no matter how much may be unearthed. The annual supply of gold is steadily declining. The placer mines are pretty well exhausted, and seeking gold in pockets or fissure veins is a very precarious business, while silver mining is nearer a permanent, fixed, calculable quantity like iron mining.

Silver is therefore a much more constant and reliable measure of value than gold. Furthermore, it will not do to deprive silver of any of its money function. The quantity of gold in existence is not sufficient for measuring values, even if the metal were adapted to small payments, such as wages, marketing, &c. Prince Bismarck uttered an expression full of quaint humor and wisdom that finely illustrates this fact. He said for the whole world to attempt to regulate values by gold alone would be like two men in a bed trying to cover themselves with a small blanket. As we can have plenty of silver to cover with and keep warm, let us not follow the President's advice by either tugging at the small gold blanket or splicing it with mere silver strips. Besides all which, even the gold monometallists can not afford to discourage silver mining, much less to stop it by suspending coinage, because at least one-third of all the gold extracted from veins now is taken out of silver mines, alloyed by nature with the white metal.

RESTRICTED COINAGE OF SILVER HELPS INDIA AT OUR EXPENSE.

India is the great regulator of the value of silver at this time, mostly because she allows free coinage and has an unlimited demand for it, but partly because she has no legal tender except silver, and as she has two hundred and fifty-four million people to supply with money, which people possess in almost inexhaustible quantities every commodity desired by man except gold and silver, she wisely throws open her mints to the silver of the wole world, with the result that she is reaping a harvest of prosperity she never enjoyed before, and reaping it at our expense. She has us right where she wants us on the silver question, and we not only voluntarily put ourselves there, but are simple enough to remain there, wondering why "prosperity hesitates upon our threshold," while it smilingly enters every hamlet in India. Indeed the progress India has made during the twelve years since we demonetized silver in 1873–'74 is simply astounding.

According to Whitaker's Almanac and all the current statistical and official publications, India's foreign commerce has increased 55 per cent. in ten years. Her exports of manufactured cotton have more than doubled in five years, and her exports of raw cotton have considerably more than doubled in four years. In 1874 she exported only a small quantity of wheat; but during last year she sent to England over 42,000,000 bushels, or about half what England has to import each year. India is also beginning largely to export Indian corn to Europe, and has the capabilities to produce it indefinitely. She likewise is becoming an enormous exporter of wool, hides, rice, linseed, rape, and mustard seed, as well as peanuts, spices, opium, and a great many other agricultural products. In brief, India is fast becoming the most dangerous rival the United States have for supplying the world with agricultural productions, especially cotton and wheat, our two greatest money crops. Her successful competition with us is very much helped by our blunder in restricting the coinage of silver and England's wisdom in letting India have free coinage.

While England nominally has only the single gold standard of full legal-tender money at home and only the single silver standard in India, yet in reality to all practical intents and purposes she is a bimetallic nation with three hundred millions of population. This is because India with its vast territorial area and two hundred and fifty-four million people is merely a proprietary colony, ruled absolutely by the home government and not by the people, who are virtually both political and industrial slaves. In truth the legislation and administration of India's affairs are as much under the control of the home government as those of Devonshire or any other shire of the kingdom. So the pretense that England is only gold monometallic is a transparent sham.

India has a foreign commerce, exports and imports, of nearly $700,000,000, and almost as much public revenue as the United Kingdom itself. About $85,000,000 of this revenue has to be paid annually to the home government for interest on borrowed money, expended in wars, famines, and internal improvements, as well as for cost of the army, civil service, and other home charges. The home government, having a dominant management of the finances of India, so manipulates the public revenue as to control the price of all exports of cotton, wheat, &c. It is done in this wise: The headquarters of the Indian Government are in London, where the secretary of state for India and his council of fifteen members sell to merchants bills of exchange, or what are called council drafts, on India. These drafts are sold for gold in London, but are payable in silver in India, where silver is the sole legal tender; and as we permit England to regulate the price of silver bullion for the world, she can sell those drafts at whatever discount she chooses to make between silver and gold.

Those drafts are now selling for 1 shilling 6½ pence per rupee, whereas their par value should be 2 shillings—the shilling representing 24 cents and the rupee 48 cents. As the drafts are selling, 5½ pence below par per rupee, that added to the 3 per cent. premium which a silver dollar ought to command over a gold dollar at 16 to 1, did command here before its demonetization, and would command again if free coinage were restored, makes a difference of about 26 cents in the dollar between the gold price of council drafts or silver bullion in London, and their par value in rupees in India. This operates as a bounty on all agricultural exports from India—a clear bonus of over 26 per cent., which explains why India exported $157,050,000 more during the fiscal year 1883 than she imported and why it was her total foreign commerce was $242,245,000 more in 1883 than in 1873, the year we demonetized silver.

The expansion in India of all industries has been as great since 1873 as her foreign commerce. All standard English financial authorities attribute it to her free coinage of silver. Whitaker dates the beginning of India's tremendous prosperity in 1873—the ill-fated year when America began to drive silver to India, where it has free mintage to all comers, while England herself is most assiduous through her allies and agents, the bondholders and national banks, in having our mints closed to even our own people, and limiting our silver coinage to $2,000,000 per month, bought at the depreciated price which she arbitrarily establishes for it in London.

I use the word "abitrarily" advisedly, because fixing the market value of a little silver bullion in London each day has nothing to do with determining the value of $2,750,000,000 of legal-tender silver coin in existence. England can and does fix the value of that particular silver at that particular time at that particular place in London, but no more; and the valuation she attaches to it controls the price because she has a monopoly on account of being the only great nation that allows "free" coinage in India. The United States could control the price just as easily as England does and by the same means, "free" coinage. There could be no possible danger of a glut of silver accumulating here, by reason of our 16 to 1 ratio offering a perpetual premium of 3 per cent. profit on the exportation of silver. That is $3,000 profit on every $100,000 exported and $30,000 profit on every million of our silver coin which might be sent abroad.

There is not a doubt that India has had more prosperity than any large nation in the world since 1873. What has been the cause of it if not plenty of silver for the first time in her history? Whitaker, in commenting on India's great development, remarks:

> Imports of gold have declined in 1885 by 12½ per cent., the net result for the last six years having been an import of 25.31 lacs (about $1,600,000), a sure sign of prosperity, because not being used for coinage it is an article of merchandise and almost entirely converted into ornament, in accordance with the Eastern method of investing savings.

A merchant wishing to purchase cotton, wheat, corn, jute, indigo, or any of the other thousand things India has to sell can either buy council drafts in London at more than 26 per cent. discount in gold or he can purchase silver bullion at the same rate of discount, then carry it to India, have it coined, and make his purchases with either the drafts or the coin. But while he has his choice of the two methods England always keeps the rupee at a par with gold by selling more or less council drafts and at whatever discount may be necessary.

It is this 26 per cent. bonus on all of India's exports that is depressing the price of American cotton at present 2 cents a pound, American wheat 20 cents a bushel, and many other American commodities in like proportion. In 1879 India sent England 739,000 bales cotton, but in 1883 it was 1,540,000, while we only sent her 2,500,000 bales. At the same rate of increase, inside of ten years the prestige of the South as the largest cotton producer will have departed and India hold the scepter. It is this state of facts which makes my colleague [Mr. HEMPHILL] declare "if our farmers are to be paid for their cotton in silver at a discount of 20 per cent. as compared with gold, the day of their prosperity is, in my opinion, gone."

It is sadly true that our cotton planters do have to sell their cotton at a discount of 20, and even 26 per cent. below its fair market price, but they are not paid "in silver at a discount of 20 per cent. as compared with gold." It is exactly the reverse of this. They are paid in gold at a premium of 26 per cent. as compared with silver, because Indian cotton purchased with the silver rupees or council drafts fixes the price of cotton in Liverpool and American cotton must fall to it. In other words, cotton is bought in India only for silver and sold in England only for gold; but England pays a bonus to the producer of Indian cotton equal to the difference between the market value of silver bullion in London, which is 1*s* 6½*d* per rupee, and the par value of the rupee with gold, which is 2*s* per rupee.

That is, the English Government does not appropriate the difference between the two as seigniorage for coinage as other governments are doing. She lets the ryot have the benefit of that by free coinage as it costs her nothing, but she takes good care to regulate to suit herself, first, the price of silver bullion in gold in London; second, the value of the coined rupee in India, council drafts serving her to accomplish both, as the United States have renounced all voice in determining the price of silver although they and the Spanish-American states produce nearly all the silver of commerce. The only possible method of preserving the par value of silver bullion is by free coinage. The same is true of gold bullion. Restrict the coinage of either metal and you reduce the demand for it, which necessarily makes the bullion value decline. Hence our folly in restricting silver coinage in connection with England's council drafts enables her to plunder the commerce of the world out of hundreds of millions annually. If my colleague would vote with me for the free and unlimited coinage of silver here we could stop the sale of council drafts at a discount and help both his constituents and mine to get a hundred cents on the dollar for their cotton.

The wheat monopoly of our Western States is also gone. India not only has immense areas of undeveloped cotton and wheat lands, but she is procuring the best sorts of seeds, implements, &c., as well as instructing the ryots in the most approved methods of cultivation. The ryot is glad to work for six cents a day in silver, and there are countless swarms of such laborers eager to compete with our Western wheat-grower and Southern cotton-planter. In fact almost every agricultural crop we produce North, South, East, or West, now has a dangerous rival in India. Even the hemp and castor-bean crops of Missouri and Illinois must take extra care or be overwhelmed. The Suez Canal has given England a much shorter route to India than by either of the capes, and De Lesseps has just announced authoritatively that another new route by the Panama Canal will be completed by 1889. Furthermore the Canadian Pacific Railway has lately been finished, and England is fortifying its termini so as to have still another route, almost an air-line, to India.

With fortified seaports and sympathising colonies in every part of the world; with more ships than all the other nations to double the continental capes, or float through the canals to distribute the vast crops of India; with a boundless area of fertile land, having every sort of climate, soil, and production desired by man, and with two hundred and fifty-four millions of docile laborers or rather slaves, begging work at 6 cents a day, what is there that looks cheerful in the prospect for our Southern and Western agriculturist? And even when no bonus shall be afforded India by our restricting silver coinage here and having it free there, she will have such an undue advantage over us as to make every lover of his country feel anxious for the future.

Since the earliest ages the commerce of the East Indies has paid better than any other and the nation controlling it has always been the dominant power of the world for the time. The one thing needful—indispensable to handle that commerce—is silver, and England, although owning nearly all the gold fields except ours and Russia's, yet does not possess hardly a single silver mine in all her colonies. Still she obtains all the silver she needs for the India and China trades 25 per cent. below the par of 15½ to 1 by our suicidal course.

There is no doubt of it. Every intelligent observer can see signs of it everywhere. A mighty struggle between India and the United States for agricultural supremacy is pending. They stand to-day face to face, like two gigantic athletes stripped for the fray, and it behooves us to do our best against 254,000,000 of slaves and paupers, guided by a wise head and strong hand.

Not only is India depriving us of a market for our products abroad, but she is also competing successfully in our own markets. During the twelve months that ended 1st March, 1886, our foreign exports fell off over $85,000,000, and it is well known that our foreign commerce has been steadily declining for a number of years. New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, as well as New Orleans and San Francisco, had better unite to stop the bonus now paid on Indian commerce by the war on silver here, or they may prepare to see the grass grow in many of their streets.

It really begins to look as if the dream of British statesmen of fifty years ago is about to be realized. They boasted then that England would abolish slavery in the petty West India Islands and make them a desert to help destroy African slavery if possible in the United States while England should conquer the great East Indies with vast area and myriads of slaves to overcome American competition in the production of agricultural staples for the world. Shall we longer help her to make good her proud boast by restricting silver coinage here and giving her control of all the surplus silver? India already has perhaps half the coined silver in existence. Shall we continue to strengthen our enemy? The price of American cotton, wheat, silver bullion, &c., rises or falls with the prices of council drafts, which latter is lower just now than it has ever been, owing no doubt to the defiant attitude of the Secretary of our Treasury toward Congress on the silver question, and also owing to the open war which President Cleveland's administration has been waging and is still waging against silver. The English Government feels that it can with impunity turn the screw a little tighter on the American cotton-planter and wheat-grower for the benefit of the ryot in India, where silver has not fallen in value, because it will buy as much as ever, and only gold has risen in value. This was admitted by the delegate from India to the international monetary conference at Paris in 1881.

FREE COINAGE COULD NOT MAKE UNITED STATES DUMPING GROUND OF SILVER.

The enemies of silver are continually harping on its "compulsory," or "forced" coinage, as if none would be coined but for the law that requires it. Such audacity is refreshing, because every one knows the compulsion is against the Government, not against silver. Free coinage is what is wanted by the people, and it is all that silver lacks to be restored to its ancient market value with gold. Allow free coinage and there would soon be such a demand for silver bullion to have coined for paying debts and taxes that I believe it would go to par with gold in thirty days. To say that free coinage would make the United States the "dumping-ground" for the silver of all the world is not only unfounded but is probably not seriously believed by one man in a hundred who has examined the subject.

It is a mere pretense—a subterfuge for want of better argument. Where would the silver come from to overflow our mints other than what we produce ourselves and a small amount we might get from Mexico and South America, after making allowance for the use of the metal in the arts? The natural increase of our population, re-enforced by immigration from abroad, will probably absorb all the silver we shall be able to coin indefinitely if our mines should continue to yield as at present, of which we have no assurance—they are getting deeper every year and may become exhausted like the Comstock did. Moreover, if free coinage should cause us to mint too much silver on our present ratio of 16 to 1, the nations of the earth wanting silver would be sure to come hither for it, because all Europe rates silver higher than we do, their ratio being 15½ to 1, or about 3 per cent. more than ours, the difference being that between .31 and .32.

Europe could not send us any silver because she has a use for every dollar she possesses to pay debts or taxes and circulates it at par with gold on the continental ratio of 15½ to 1. Even Germany stands in this category, having none to sell for the reason that she has remonetized all her old silver coins and made all silver money an unlimited legal tender to the government, while she is now said to be seriously deliberating about making it unlimited tender for private debts, and also to permit free coinage.

No silver ever comes back from the East. India and China are as much the vortex that swallows up all the silver that enters either as the tropics are the natural grave of redundant population. Besides, have the Europeans no debts to pay, no taxes to pay with their silver, and as it is all coined on the ratio of 15½ to 1 would they bring it here to have it coined over at 16 to 1, thereby losing 3 per cent. instead of making anything, and then have to invest it here in the purchase of something to our advantage more than theirs?

But suppose all Europe, and India too, should dump their entire supply of silver upon us, we could utilize it and still have less money than France per capita, by going upon the silver basis alone, as we did in the main between 1834 and 1873, just as Austria and Russia and several other great nations are now doing. If other nations should carry our gold away they would have to part with their silver to get it. Prices would neither rise nor fall anywhere, because the same quantity of precious metals as money would still be in existence serving the world. Although we kept but little home-coined gold in circulation between 1792 and 1834, because we undervalued gold and had but little home-coined silver afloat between 1834 and 1873–'4, yet we were not without a liberal supply of gold coin in the first instance, mostly Spanish doubloons; and silver coin in the second instance, Mexican, Spanish, French, and English. Both the gold and silver coins we used in each case were cheaper than ours, and came nearer conforming to the French ratio of 15½ to 1, and as our Congress, in obedience to the Constitution, published assays of these foreign coins once a year they passed as legal tender. So it can not fairly be said, as my colleague [Mr. DARGAN] claims, that the United States have ever been monometallic except between 1873 and 1878, when we had no coin of any sort in circulation.

But it is said silver is too bulky, that it requires too much room, too many vaults for its safe-keeping if it is to circulate among the people by certificates. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], in his admirable speech on the silver question, demonstrated from official sources that the Government vaults for storing silver up to date have cost but a small fraction above $200,000—a mere bagatelle compared with the immeasurable advantage of a stable metallic currency over a fluctuating rag money one. However, suppose we had fifteen hundred millions of silver coin circulating by certificates, and it took Fortress Monroe to hold it as well as ten regiments of troops to guard it, the people had better bear the expense than go back to the shinplaster days of wildcat State banks of issue before the war.

"Take the good the gods provide thee" lest they punish for ingratitude. We are the only large nation having a sufficient home production of both precious metals to warrant the expectation that with good luck and good management we may in time possess enough gold and silver coin not to need any paper money at all, except as certificates to represent coin dollar for dollar.

BUT FREE COINAGE AT 16 TO 1 WOULD MAKE THIS COUNTRY DUMPING GROUND FOR GOLD.

If we have free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 it will accomplish two positive results: First, it will protect the market value of silver bullion every where within a margin of 3 per cent. against India council drafts, and also against coinage on foreign government account for a fat seigniorage, which will tend to restore free coinage everywhere except in gold monometallic countries; second, free coinage of both metals on the ratio of 16 to 1 would give gold the advantage by 3 per cent., and tend to keep the yellow metal among us while sending the white one away, so that foreigners would always come hither to sell gold or buy silver, but never to buy gold or sell silver, which would be against us, because we ought to procure all the silver we can to carry on successful trade with the East. We have the advantage in location, the advantage in possessing commodities that the East wants, and we have considerable silver, but not enough for her insatiate demand for more, more, unless we draw on Mexico and South America.

So that to coin silver at 16 to 1 while all the world is coining at 15½ to 1 will give England and other nations seeking the Eastern trade 3 per cent. advantage, and that alone will decide the contest against our merchants, such a course being only less suicidal than our restricted coinage is now. Why should we voluntarily and cravenly, without a struggle, resign the palm of supremacy in the China trade at least? That colossal empire, with its four hundred million human beings, is said to be waking from the slumber of ages. Why not take the tide at the flood and strike out for a commercial destiny worthy of this grand Republic? The silver that has reached China since 1873 is said to have quickened everything into new industrial, political, and social life. The Chinaman worships silver above anything in the world, and as he has a boundless trade why shall we not get every grain of silver we can to control that trade? Why not be as parsimonious with silver compared with gold as the rest of the world? Why not change our coinage ratio to 15½ to 1, and have done with all instability in the market value of either coin or bullion of gold or silver, and abolish Gresham's law forever as regards the precious metals? When less than half of Europe, in fact when only a single great nation, France, allowed free coinage of both metals on the basis of 15½ to 1, the difference of 3 per cent. against our silver coins of 16 to 1 was quite sufficient to drain us of nearly all our silver. That having been the case when only France had 15½ to 1, how much more will it be the case hereafter since all the foreign nations have adopted the 15½ to 1. As Europe has over $1,400,000,000 of full legal-tender silver already coined on the basis of 15½ to 1, and as we even now have but a little over $200,000,000 of legal-tender silver coined at 16 to 1, which ought to yield, the United States or Europe, to bring about the pretended indispensable "international ratio" that the President and others urge so vehemently? Our first coinage ratio between the metals was 15 to 1. This was adopted in 1792, when Hamilton organized the Mint, and it underrated gold, because at that very time France was having free coinage at 15½ to 1, which caused most of our gold to leave us; but French silver took its place and left the world no poorer in precious metals by it—left France no poorer, the United States no poorer. This state of affairs, as before remarked, continued till 1834, when our ratio was changed to 16 to 1, which reversed the currents of the metals by attracting overvalued gold to this country and sending away undervalued silver. This simple statement demonstrates that my colleagues [Messrs. DARGAN and HEMPHILL] were mistaken in asserting that Gresham's law had anything to do with expelling gold before 1834 or silver after that to 1873–'74 because Gresham's law, as they define it, is, "of two sorts of money in circulation, the cheaper will drive out the dearer." In both the cases cited as to the international movement of our coins the dearer money drove out the cheaper—exactly the reverse of what my colleagues claim. The overvalued coin staid with us. The undervalued went abroad, where it was more appreciated. There is no danger now of our gold coin being exported. We value gold higher than they do in Europe; but our silver coin would go away by the ship-load if we had free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1 and foreign gold would come here to pay for it. France adopted the ratio of 15½ to 1 in 1785 and has adhered to it ever since, permitting free coinage down to 1874, which made her the great arbiter of the price of both gold and silver bullion during all that time. Everybody knew exactly at what price he could buy or sell gold or silver bullion at the French mint. So that for nearly a century there was comparatively no fluctuation whatever in the commercial value of the two metals. Hence, by reason of our two faulty ratios, that of 1792 being too low for gold and that of 1834 too high for it, and both conflicting with the free-coinage ratio of so powerful a government as France, nearly all of our gold coins went abroad in the first instance for silver and nearly all of our silver coins went abroad in the second instance for gold. Whenever any strong government in Europe shall establish free coinage of silver again our present legal-tender silver dollars will go abroad once more, just as they did before 1873–'74.

The same cause that sent them away then still exists, and the only thing that prevents some great nation like Austria or Russia from granting free coinage now is that as long as the United States (the largest silver producer) shall restrict the coinage of silver, the bullion value of the metal will be so reduced that it will pay better to coin silver only on government account for the sake of the seigniorage.

So that if the bondholders, the national banks, and the creditor class generally were sincere in declaring that they are friends to silver, and while preferring gold money themselves do not seek to utterly destroy silver as a full legal tender, they would prove their good faith by supporting free coinage at 16 to 1. Free coinage would attract white metal bullion hither from every part of the world unless some other nation's mint would offer free coinage on better terms, say 15½ to 1, or unless some private individual should be willing to pay within 3 per cent. of the commercial value of the silver bullion.

The bondholding syndicate and creditor class know this very well, as they are perfectly familiar with all laws of finance; yet they vehemently object to free coinage of silver, object to any coinage of silver as full legal tender, although the law permits it for all debts public or private, and they object simply because they wish to blot out one-half the debt-paying money of the world to double the value of the other half, and require two days' labor to pay a debt or tax which one day's labor ought to pay.

"INTERNATIONALITY" OF MONEY A SHAM.

This is their unalterable purpose, and to hide it they resort to all sorts of subterfuges—none more absurd than the pretext that there must be an "international agreement" as to a common ratio between the metals. Second, as to the extent to which silver shall be coined, whether by free or restricted mintage. Third, as to the amount for which silver shall be legal tender, whether for any sum or only a small, fixed sum. Even the President countenances this exploded absurdity about the "internationality" of silver coinage and tells us that he sent Manton Marble to Europe last summer to ascertain if the leading powers had changed from the attitude of ill-concealed contempt which they displayed toward the "internationality" of silver coinage humbug propounded by the United States at the two international monetary conferences that had been held at Paris at our request in the years 1878 and 1881, respectively.

The President further says that his agent found no change either in the governments or people on the "internationality" of silver questions, a fact which any sophomore could have foretold who had read the debates and proceedings of the two conferences of 1878 and 1881, in which the delegates from the United States were hardly treated with common civility, especially in the latter one. Of all the hollow excuses ever offered for parading a humbug, the one that takes the highest premium for audacity is the reason assigned in the cunningly devised act of 1878, remonetizing but restricting the coinage of silver and instructing the President to invite an international monetary conference at Paris "to adopt a common ratio between gold and silver."

As all Europe then had and still has, the ratio of 15½ to 1, the United States had only to change their ratio from 16 to 15½ to establish a universal ratio between both bullion and coin of both gold and silver, so that there should be no more fluctuations of value, no more anxiety about free or restricted coinage, or about full or limited legal-tenders. But no, that would have been too easy a settlement of the silver question, because it would leave no pretext for negotiating abroad, while our bondholders, national banks, and money-lenders plied their vocation of robbing the people.

Right at this point it is a pertinent question, Did the enemies of silver in the Congress of 1873–'74 ask for an international monetary conference to decide whether silver should be demonetized or not; and if they never called for such a conference, then why is it so absolutely prerequisite, as the President seems to think, that we must have such a conference now to remonetize it.

What necessity is there for any international monetary conference to regulate coinage in the United States? Did we ever have any such conference before the war? Is there such a thing as international money? Are not nations as jealous of preserving their national coins as their flag? Second only to the absurdity of a pretended necessity for international agreement about silver coinage is the brazen hypocrisy which insists that the best means to compel Europe to agree to our ratio and have free coinage as well as unlimited legal tender of silver is for us to suspend silver coinage altogether. That is, if a man is languishing on account of short rations the way to improve his condition is to deprive him of all rations. The reason silver bullion is depressed in price now is that it is denied free coinage like gold. Deprive it of all right of coinage and its price would necessarily go much lower, as the only use for silver then would be in the arts (provided other nations should also discard it as coin, of which there is not the slightest danger).

But if the people of the United States ever suspend the coinage of silver entirely as a means of coercing Europe into "free" coinage of the metal, free coinage will never take place. The United States, by substituting a great deal of paper money for coin, has silver to sell, while Europe has it to buy; and as restricting the coinage here lowers the price of the metal, of course the total suspension of its coinage here would lower the price still more, so as to enable the nations of the earth to clear a larger seigniorage than at present, so as to enable England and India to sell council drafts cheaper than now, and thereby afford still wider scope to rob the commerce of the world, and especially our commerce. The total suspension of silver coinage here would likewise so strengthen the bondholding and creditor classes that they would put forth redoubled efforts to prevent the restoration of free coinage or any coinage of silver of full legal tender.

We have seen how hard it is to restore silver to the equal privilege it occupied with gold at our Mint before 1873. The secret, treacherous experiment of suspending silver coinage ought to deter us from openly consenting to any more experiments. It is not the friends of silver but its avowed bitter enemies who ask for the total suspension of its coinage, and there is no safer maxim in war, in politics, and in the battles or private life than "never do anything your enemy wants you to do."

All the enemies of silver on this floor, all its enemies in the press or on the hustings protest most solemnly that they are bimetallists; that they love silver dearly, and long to see it an international money, having a uniform ratio, free coinage, and unlimited legal tender. Yet they do not budge to have our ratio changed from 16 to 15½, so as to have a universal ratio; do not budge to grant free coinage; but fight in season and out of season to suspend all coinage, and, instead of consenting to unlimited legal tender, actually argue strenuously that silver is not, ought not, and shall not be a legal tender for our bonded debt. Was ever impudence more unblushing or hypocrisy more glaring?

My colleague [Mr. DARGAN] is an honorable exception to this cowardly method of attacking silver. He stands "alone in his glory," I believe, on this floor as an open enemy of silver, except for token money, and an avowed champion of gold as the sole unlimited legal tender. Considering that four-tenths of all the currency in existence to-day is rag money, most of which might become entirely worthless or nearly so at the happening of either of several contingencies, is it wise, would it be prudent to deprive about half the real money of the world—God Almighty's money, the money which can stand the ordeal of fire—of its legal-tender power and thereby roll back the car of civilization for ages? That is just what the total and permanent demonetization of silver would do. Even with gold and silver both as equally valuable instruments of industry and progress Joseph Bonaparte eloquently said that "gold in its last analysis is the sweat of the poor and the blood of the brave." Blot out silver as a full-tender money metal, and gold in its last analysis then would mean the destruction of the life of millions as well as the blasting of the happiness of myriads of men.

Of all these champions of gold, but assassins of silver, there are two who are so notorious, so conspicuously Dugald Dalgetties in the "war of the standards" fighting on the side of gold, while claiming to muster under the banner of silver, that I can not forbear to mention their names. They are Cernuschi and S. Dana Horton. The one born in Italy, naturalized in France, and a citizen of the world, as he calls himself, on the silver question. The other an American, who has sold his splendid talents to the enemies of his country and mankind to fight the battles of gold monopoly. They both lag superfluous on the stage. They have burdened the press with a rehash of their stale fallacies and travelled so long in the same monotonous circle of sophistries that the very sight of a book or article with the name of Cernuschi or Horton to it on the silver question makes the gorge rise in loathing disgust. They ought to retire from the field and give place to more modest combatants like the gentleman from my State—the former Civil Service Commissioner, and lately appointed Comptroller of the Currency—who has secured his reward for parading his arrogant ignorance and rude style of argument on the silver question at the National Bankers' Association at Chicago and the Southern commercial convention at Atlanta last summer.

Yes, sir; the bondholders, the national bankers, the money-lenders, the "gold-bugs" (to use a slang phrase) have bribed the best intellect of the world and subsidized a large portion of the press to saturate the literature of the age with fallacious sophistries in the interest of gold against silver; which, taken in connection with the mighty influence for evil that gold has exercised over our legislation and administration, sadly illustrates how true it is—

> If money go before all ways
> Do lie open.

This administration is sounder on the gold question than any other. True, the President is enthusiastic for civil service—keeping Republicans in and Democrats out of office, even postal railway clerks; but any Democrat having potent influence, who is willing to exchange it for the livery of the administration in the interest of Wall street against the people can get office even if Republicans have to be turned out.

NO SUCH THING AS "UNIT OF VALUE."

One of the most conspicuous falsehoods that this overshadowing gold monopoly urges in its defense is that gold is now our sole "unit of value," by which it is claimed all other values or properties, including silver, must be measured, and this is the reason assigned by the present Secretary of the Treasury why no interest or principal of our huge public debt can or shall be paid in silver. Even President Cleveland countenances this idea by permitting it to be carried out in practice and by saying in his message: "Every patriotic citizen who does not desire his Government to pay in silver such of its obligations as should be paid in gold" ought to feel a deep concern against the further coinage of silver.

My colleague [Mr. HEMPHILL] also says:

> The act of Congress of February 12, 1873, declares that the gold dollar shall be the "unit of value" for the United States. This was a deliberate settlement of the "unit of value," by which as a standard, the ratio of all other money should be determined. Measured by this standard, the silver dollar is only four-fifths of the value of the unit dollar, although it is stamped as if it were a real dollar. Now, it is conceded on all sides that the silver in a silver dollar was formerly worth as much as the gold in a gold dollar, and that now it sells for 20 per cent. less. To hold that this is not a depreciation from the universal standard fixed for the United States is a palpable and manifest error.

Let us see if this "universal standard fixed for the United States," as alleged by my colleague, is really our only standard. Even if what he says were true how can he assert that making gold the sole "unit of value" in this country "was a deliberate settlement" of the "standard" or "ratio" by which "all other money should be determined?" He admits that the act establishing this sole "gold unit of value," as he calls it, was the infamous law of 12th February, 1873, that demonetized silver, and was smuggled through both Houses of Congress as I have described, without anybody except the conference committees knowing the effect of the law, and without even the President who signed it knowing until the next fall that an act had been approved by him demonetizing silver. If there was any "deliberate settlement of the unit of value" in that sort of legislation, then I do not know the meaning of either the words "deliberate" or "settlement."

It is strange doctrine that the disgraceful act of 1873 should have deliberately settled the unit of value in favor of an exclusive gold standard, when just as soon as the people found out silver had been demonetized they forthwith required it to be remonetized, and sought to place it where it was before as one of our money metals, having equal legal-tender power with gold on the ratio of 16 to 1, and the same privilege of "free" coinage as gold. That the act of 1878 remonetizing silver restored it to the old-established American ratio of 16 to 1, and made it at that rate a legal tender for any public or private debt, there is not the ghost of a fraction of a shadow of an atom of doubt; but this act of 1878 did not restore "free" coinage, simply because coinage had to be limited to secure a two-thirds majority in each House of Congress to overcome the veto of acting President Hayes.

And now because silver bullion is estimated 20 per cent. below its par value with gold on account of the compulsory veto of a fraudulent President denying it free coinage, is it just, is it truthful, is it candid, is it manly, to claim that silver bullion is really depressed 20 per cent. below the gold or "universal standard fixed for the United States" by the infamous act of 1873, which every honest American ought to be ashamed to quote?

A tyro in the knowledge of the Constitution and laws of the United States ought to know that we have but "one unit of money," although we have two standards of value. Our unit is the "dollar;" our standards are gold and silver. The unit is the starting point. All fractions of money below it are divisions of it. All sums above it are combinations of it, and any amount of money is always expressed in dollars alone, not in halves, quarters, or dimes, nor in eagles, half-eagles, or quarter-eagles. So likewise the unit of money in France is the franc, in England the pound sterling, and every nation has a different unit of money from its standard of money, and the sneaking smuggler who interpolated the particle "the" in the phrase "the unit of value" in the demonetizing act of 1873 was a bungler. It means nothing more than "the unit of money" or "the unit of measure."

Our Constitution clearly establishes two standards of value when it declares that Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and that no State shall make anything but gold and silver a legal tender. "Regulate" implies more than one kind of coin, and as the States are prohibited from making anything but "gold and silver" a legal tender the inference is irresistible that it was intended Congress should also make both gold and silver legal tender and nothing else but gold and silver legal tender for private debts. Our first coinage act of 1792 established the "dollar" as the "unit" of money, not the unit of value; but it also provided at the same time for a silver dollar and a gold dollar. Three hundred and seventy-one and one-fourth grains of pure silver was to constitute the silver dollar, and gold coins should be struck: "Eagles each to be of the value of $10 or units and contain 247½ grains of pure gold; half-eagles and quarter-eagles of corresponding proportions." That is to say, every fifteen pounds' weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with one pound weight of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or less quantities of the respective metals.

Thus the law stood until 1834, when Congress having determined to give gold a higher legal-tender value, with a view to attract the metal to this country and keep it here, changed the relative legal-tender proportion between gold and silver to exactly 16 to 1, at which it has remained ever since, except that desiring to alter the alloy of our coins from one-twelfth to one-tenth base metal in 1837, two-hundredths of a grain of pure gold more was added to the eagle. All the silver and gold coins authorized by the act of 1792 were made a full legal tender, and although the ratio between the metals was changed in 1834, and again in 1837, every coin of both metals except subsidiary silver remained as full legal tender down to 1873 with the privilege of "free" coinage besides. Silver was as full legal tender as gold at the time all the bonded debt was incurred to carry on the civil war. The principal of most of those bonds was even payable on the face of them in greenbacks, and it was only the interest that at first had to be paid in coin; but in 1869 the bondholders induced Congress, by influences which every one can understand, to pass an act declaring the principal of the bonds payable in coin also.

In 1870, those same bondholders, by the same all-powerful secret influence, caused another act to be passed exempting the bonds from all State or local taxation, and to prevent any possible mistake as to what sort of money in which either old or the renewed bonds should be paid, had it printed on each bond as part of its obligation, "That it should be paid in coin of the standard value prescribed by law on the 14th of July, 1870," and our present silver dollar was one of the full legal-tender coins referred to in that act; and in all changes or renewals of the bonds since the same provision is inserted on their face that they are payable in the standard coins of full legal tender existing in 1870.

Hence, for the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], or anybody else to claim that the principal of the bonds is payable alone in gold, or that the interest is payable alone in gold, is absurd.

Furthermore, the act of 1878 remonetizing silver exactly as it stood before 1873, expressly declares that all silver dollars hereafter or heretofore coined by the United States, of standard weight and fineness (412½ grains), "shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except when otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract."

In addition to this all our customs duties are obliged to be paid in coin according to the law; and section 3694 of the Revised Statutes declares that "the coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund" to pay in coin the interest and 1 per cent. of the principal of the public debt each year.

Yet, in the face of the law of 1878 rehabilitating silver as it was previous to 1873, in face of the laws of 1869 and 1870–'71, declaring that all the war bonds should be paid in the coins that were then legal tender; indeed, in face of the stipulations printed on the face of the bonds themselves; and lastly, in face of the mandatory statute that all coin paid for duties shall be dedicated to payment of the interest and 1 per cent. of the principal of the public debt each year, the present administration, treading in the footsteps of its Republican predecessors, pays both principal and interest of the bonds exclusively in gold, upon the pretense that "the unit of value" means the same thing as "the standard of value."

FREE-TRADERS SHOULD FAVOR FREE COINAGE.

All free-traders ought to support free coinage of silver. That is the logical result of their doctrine. My colleagues [Messrs. DARGAN and HEMPHILL] are free-traders—ultra free-traders, I believe—yet they support the monopoly of gold for free coinage, thereby co-operating with the high-tariff men, who are the best friends gold monometallism has on this floor. If silver bullion could come and go at pleasure, as gold does at the mint, it would retain the steady market relation it has held to gold for over two hundred years, but being restricted in the exercise of one of its most important functions, to wit, serving as coinage, its commercial value declines in exact proportion as the market value of the metal having a monopoly of free coinage rises. A tariff on imported hats, for instance, depresses the price of the foreign hat and in the same ratio increases the price of the home-made hat. The hat manufacturer, however, does meet with some competition among home producers, but gold has the sole exclusive privilege of "free" coinage. As silver has but two things to give it value—one, use in the arts, the other, coinage—when "free trade in coinage" is prohibited to silver while it is accorded to gold is my colleague [Mr. DARGAN] justified in speaking of the silver dollar as "half-breed fiat?" Commerce must be free, competition must be unrestrained, before the relative market value of two things can be fairly determined.

But we do know that the legal-tender power of a silver dollar is as much now as it ever was, is as great as a gold dollar; and we also know that the value of uncoined silver bullion has not fallen below its former nominal rate, compared with other things except gold, which proves that only gold has risen. Silver has not fallen and gold has merely gained in increased value what silver has lost by being deprived of free coinage.

SILVER CAN NOT TAKE ITSELF OUT OF THE TREASURY.

It also pays out silver coin or certificates only to other creditors of the Government, and has not been paying it out even to them, as a rule, except when no other sort of money could be had, preferring to keep the silver locked up in the Treasury under the pretense that it would not circulate among the people; and the Secretary of the Treasury claims merit for himself in respect to silver because, as he says:

> I have upheld its value by never compelling its receipt by any creditor of the Government, and never failing to provide by exchange and transfers whatever currency might be preferred.

That is to say, he has left silver, the lamb, to take care of itself in presence of the bondholder, the wolf, and has never forced a hostile bondholder to accept a single dollar of it in satisfaction of his dues, although both the bond and the law provide that silver may be used for that purpose.

How can the $85,000,000 of silver in the Treasury get out unless the Secretary will pay it out on the public debt or in pursuance of an appropriation by Congress? How generous to the enemies of silver the Secretary is, "never compelling its receipt by any creditor of the Government." He readily receives silver for customs duties, in fact says most of the duties at New York, the great entrepôt, are paid in silver or silver certificates; but neither of them is good enough to pay the bondholder, who, if not a superior sort of being, must at least be paid in nothing but gold, and silver must not be paid out to anybody as long as national-bank bills or greenbacks can be had.

How different is it in France, where the government pays gold, silver, or treasury notes at its option, not at the option of its creditor!

FALSE PROPHESIES ABOUT SILVER DRIVING OUT GOLD.

When the bill that remonetized silver in 1878 was under discussion, doleful prophecies were freely indulged that if silver were remonetized gold would immediately quit the country and that we should have no coin but silver. Since that memorable debate the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has preached a jeremiad of that sort so often here I have it by heart. But instead of gold going out it has been steadily coming in. We had but about $200,000,000 gold when we remonetized silver in 1878. We now have about $600,000,000. Even the President in his letter to the Democratic Representatives in Congress in February, 1885, predicted if silver coinage were not speedily suspended gold would leave the country and financial ruin would sweep over the land, but, nevertheless, gold keeps coming in. If the President had been better posted as to facts and financial principles he would not now be ranked as poor a prophet in finance as Wiggins is in weather. Financial ruin does hover over the South and West land, but it has been caused not by gold leaving the country, but by the administration contracting the currency and making desperate war on silver, which have grievously depressed the price of all Southern and Western productions. The President has made the South a poor return for her solid vote.

But it is said by some that we have enough money already, and that therefore silver coinage should be suspended instead of being made "free." In round numbers we have about $600,000,000 in gold, $600,000,000 in paper, and $300,000,000 in silver, including the $75,000,000 subsidiary coin; in all, $1,500,000,000, or $25 for each inhabitant, counting the population at sixty million—just about half the circulation France thinks advisable, and from $5 to $10 less than Calhoun thought proper. Short as it is of what it ought to be in quantity to constitute a healthy circulation, if this $25 per capita were abroad coursing up and down the channels of business in active motion, the industries of the land might get along tolerably well. But this amount of money per capita is not in circulation. It is very doubtful if more than $13 or $14 per capita are current among the people to-day.

RESTRICTED COINAGE AND CONTRACTION ARE BLIGHTING BOTH THE SOUTH AND WEST.

Money is plentiful in the great cities—even superabundant at money centers, such as the Treasury of the United States and the vaults of the banks, especially the national banks—but that is the very reason why there is little or no money among the people or in the extremities of the body politic. The circulating medium of the country has congestion of the gold fever, which has contracted the money into a few hands and at a few places in its efforts to exact a premium on gold, to be paid in greenbacks or silver, to get the yellow metal for discharging the principal and interest of the public debt; in other words, to revive Gresham's law as it existed in this country previous to 1st January, 1879. Money-lending capitalists are never so happy or prosperous as when there is change, change in the relative values of different kinds of money, and to put gold to a premium again they have tried the virtue of contracting our currency to the verge of desperation, and in this devilish work they have had the active, earnest co-operation of the present and preceding administrations of the Government. Even an intelligent school-boy can see that the administration is now and has long been either a partner or a tool of the bondholders and national banks to appreciate gold and degrade or destroy both silver and greenbacks.

The two means employed to accomplish this end are, first, remorseless contraction; and second, defiance of the plain letter of the law making silver and silver certificates a legal tender as well as gold for the public debt. The first large item of contraction is the reserve that is held by the national banks. This amount to $255,000,000. The second grand item of contraction is the one-hundred-million reserve of gold to redeem the greenbacks, provided for, but only by implication, in the act of 1882. There is no more use for this enormous idle fund in the Treasury than there is for a fifth wheel to a wagon. Nobody wants greenbacks redeemed; and from 1879 to 1882 there was no law requiring any separate fund to be held exclusively for redeeming greenbacks. The Secretary of the Treasury was merely authorized by the resumption act of 1865 to redeem any greenbacks that might be presented, out of any coin in the Treasury, and in order to get such coin, if he did not have it on hand, he was and is now empowered to sell bonds for coin.

But when the national banks were rechartered in 1882, some deep-designing friend of the bondholders, the banks, and the gold barons inserted an amendment, in the small Senate, providing that "the issue of gold certificates shall be suspended whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000," and thus nearly $2 of gold per head of the population is withdrawn permanently from circulation, for a useless purpose, as was demonstrated by the operations of the Treasury between 1879 and 1882. This act of 1882 is not a mandatory law compelling the Secretary of the Treasury to keep $100,000,000 of gold locked up all the while as a redemption fund. He is only prohibited from issuing gold certificates after his supply of gold falls below that sum, yet it has been construed to require that this useless reserve shall forever lie idle in the interest of the bondholder and national banker by reducing the circulation. A third item of contraction is $48,000,000 of greenbacks held for redemption of national-bank notes; and a fourth item is $24,000,000 national-bank notes held for redemption of national-bank notes; making a total of, say, $427,000,000 withdrawn from active circulation by law, which is largely increased by two other items of contraction.

First. The destruction of greenbacks by wearing out and loss in the use of $346,000,000 for over twenty years; the amount of loss, estimated by good judges, exceeding $46,000,000.

Second. The last source of contraction of the currency is the constant increase of population, which is swelled by an addition of at least a million and a half people a year, without any increase of the money supply for their use. So that it is safe to say we have not more than $1,000,000,000 currency all told for our 60,000,000 inhabitants. And the Secretary of the Treasury has reduced the circulation over another $100,000,000 by failing to pay out that sum in redemption of pastdue bonds during last year. He would not do it out of tender regard for the national banks. He was a better friend to them than his predecessor, who did call in during each of the previous years ending 1st November, 1884, and 1st November, 1883, respectively, over $100,000,000. The Democratic Secretary of the Treasury could not bear the thought of calling in a bond upon which national-bank bills had been issued; so he contracted the currency at the expense of the people, by loss of interest as well as circulating medium. Hence it is under rather than over the mark to say that we have but about $900,000,000 of circulation, or $15 per capita, not half enough; and that explains in part the present depression, stagnation, and gloom.

This contraction, added to the injurious effect of the restricted coinage of silver, by operating to bestow a bounty on production and competition in India against us tells the whole story of our present pecuniary ills. Established industries are languishing, which deters new enterprises from beginning operations at all. Above all, labor is discouraged and wages are depressed. The poor man who has nothing to sell but his labor finds but a low market for it, and often no market whatever. The whole agricultural section in particular is in the situation of a wood-chopper who should send one hundred hands to a forest to cut fuel with only fifty axes. There are not enough dollars or financial tools to carry on prosperous industry.

Our scant and contracted supply of money, together with the bounty offered to India's competition by our restricted coinage, operates with peculiar hardship against the ex-Confederate States, which are in a worse fix financially than any part of the Union, because they are drained every year of at least $50,000,000 taxes which they have to pay toward pensions and principal and interest of the public debt, hardly a cent of which ever goes back to those States, while every section of the North gets back all it pays toward those objects and a proportional share of our quota.

When one reflects on the blighting effect of these three causes upon the struggling South, is it any mystery why the harder her people work the poorer they get; any difficulty in explaining how it is that tens of thousands of farmers down there are fast becoming mere tenants-at-will or serfs on land they have had to mortgage to bondholding capitalists of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, or Boston? The moneyed men of those cities likewise own or control all our railroads at the South, all our factories, and all our national banks, as well as the bulk of the most eligible real estate in our cities.

Those bondholding, tax-consuming, and money-lending gentlemen, having more cash than they know what to do with, are employing agents in almost every desirable county in my State and in the adjoining States to loan money on the mortgage of land at only half its value and at an average of about 10 per cent. annual interest compounded. I will venture that a mortgage or heavy debt is hanging over one-fourth, if not one-half, of the farms and plantations in the South, and from what I can gather it is pretty much the same case at the West. I am sure I have not misstated the facts as to my own Congressional district, and I am equally sure that my district is as well off as those of my colleagues, Messrs. HEMPHILL and DARGAN. In this connection, to show the difference between the quantity of ready money which the Eastern people hold compared with those of the West and South, I will mention that Mr. Eaton, one of the late United States Senators from Connecticut, and a resident of Hartford, recently said:

In the little city of Hartford, with a population of 50,000 people, we have permanently loaned in the West $200,000,000.

More money than the whole State of South Carolina, including Charleston, is estimated to be worth.

While my constituents do not advocate repudiating a single dollar of the public debt, and while they will cheerfully pay proper pensions to the soldiers, or widows or dependent relatives of deceased or disabled soldiers who served in the Federal Army during the civil war, yet they do protest against having to pay unjust, and formerly unknown, kinds and rates of pensions. They also solemnly protest against the contraction of the currency and against restricting the coinage of silver, which most of them think are the prime causes of their long familiar acquaintance with poor-house associations. They believe in hard money in preference to rag money, as do all true Democrats.

Hence they prefer silver to national-bank paper, and this "war of the standards" in the United States is to a great extent but a death-grapple between silver and national-banks-of-issue rags. My colleague [Mr. HEMPHILL] attempts to be facetious at the expense of the friends of silver, because they say free coinage of silver will bring prosperity to the country, revive industry, increase the wages of labor, befriend the debtor, and help the poor man generally. He charges, in effect, that the friends of silver are appealing to the poor voters to enlist their sympathies in the contest; but let me ask if it was not the President of the United States who first lugged into the argument appeals to "the laboring men and women of the land" and "poor widows and orphans" who have funds invested in war bonds, which have to be paid in part by other laboring men and women and poor widows and orphans?

My sarcastic colleague also scouts the idea that the bondholders and money-lenders are striving to destroy one-half of the debt and tax-paying money of the world, or that they are attempting to depreciate the price of any property. He thinks because they are large property holders themselves that they will uphold all values; but let me ask my colleague if, when the wealthy Eastern holders of the mortgages against the land of his constituents and mine come to have those lands sold, he thinks they will pay full price for them, or be willing to buy them as cheaply as possible.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, how easily Congress can make the people of this country prosperous and happy by simply letting them have plenty of money, as France does her people, to carry on their business. If you take nothing from nothing nothing remains, and if you add nothing to nothing nothing is still the result. In a country where there is but a scant supply of money how can a poor man get a start? How can he save anything? But an abundance of good money, whether coin or Treasury notes, vitalizes a country, as copious rains from heaven fertilize the earth wherever they fall in summer. It has been said by more than one philosophic historian that the use of only one of the precious metals as money by Asia, while Europe has always used both, explains the wonderful difference in the civilization of the two continents.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER SURE TO BE RESTORED.

Mr. Speaker, we are bound to have unlimited coinage of silver again. It is an imperious necessity. The American people will never give up their silver dollar. It has always been the favorite money of our people, not only since the Revolution but in colonial times. It comes to us from Spain, who got it in the time of the Emperor Charles V from Austria, where it was first coined in the "dale" or valley of Joachim in Bohemia, near some silver mines. I firmly believe our people would fight for their silver dollar, if it were necessary, as quickly as they would for their flag. Twice it has been thought advisable to change the relative value of our gold and silver coins, and on both occasions the gold coins were altered, not the silver, the people seeming to regard that as too sacred a thing to be intermeddled with. Then let our silver dollar remain. Let our gold dollar remain. We need them both, and all we can get of both by free coinage, and six or seven hundred million of greenbacks besides, with which to pay debts and taxes and carry on business.

Yes, sir, the instincts of the people, the conservatism of the ages, are on the side of silver, and laboring men, poor men who want to acquire something for a rainy day, are not going to help destroy half the accumulated coin wealth of the world and double the amount of labor or commodities that will be necessary to pay existing debts or taxes.

A DOLLAR OUGHT TO BUY MORE IN HARD THAN IN FLUSH TIMES.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] quotes several pages of comparative price-lists to show that a dollar will buy more of the necessaries of life these hard times than in flush times, and he deduces from that the conclusion that it is better for a laboring man and a poor man to have but little money in the country and low wages. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is adding insult to injury. If the poor laboring man could get profitable employment in hard times so he could procure dollars it would be better for him; but when he seeks in vain for living wages and has to strike or tramp, as tens of thousands of our laborers are doing now, what is the use to mock with the Platonic philosophy that a dollar will purchase more when business is dull than when it is prosperous?

It is a refinement of cruelty to torment a man with the show of pleasures or advantages which can not be reached. Virgil tells us that the most excruciating torture in hell is that of Tantalus, who is surrounded on all sides by the near presence of the most tempting viands and beverages while he endures perpetual gnawing hunger and unquenchable thirst. Such is the fate of the poor laborer in dull times, with but little money and less employment, when he sees cheap food, clothing, &c., but can not buy for want of the dollar.

For near a century France held all the gold and silver of the world at a legal-tender and commercial value of 15½ to 1. If she with only about two-thirds of our present population could do it, why can not we do it as effectually as if both metals were melted into one solid mass?

DEBTS SHOULD BE PAID ACCORDING TO CONTRACT.

Many, very many other things could be said in favor of unlimited coinage of silver, but it is unnecessary. Let it suffice to say that not only all our national debts but nearly all our State, municipal, and private debts likewise have been contracted on the basis of both gold and silver as unlimited legal tender. The people therefore intend to have as free coinage of silver as of gold. There will be no more Presidents of the United States elected without knowing whether they are for or against free coinage of silver. I for one am for paying all debts according to the contract, according to the stipulations in the bond. The holders of our public debt have grown fat and imperious on an exclusive gold diet. They must be treated with a little silver regimen.

It will be decidedly better for their patriotism and moral health generally. It will not do to let them profit more by cruel avarice than even Shylock. He was content with the first stipulation in his bond, while our creditors, whose claims mostly first called for only greenbacks, then changed the basis in 1869 to coin, and attempted in 1873 to convert it into gold alone, still demand gold, although their infamous law of 1873 was repealed in 1878 and silver restored to its ancient privilege. The cheek of these gold robbers is simply astounding and their cupidity without a parallel.

No, there is one similar case in the range of literature, and it is a remarkable coincidence that the parallel character should have lived in Boston, where the stupendous fraud of demonetizing silver was first conceived and the plot matured and the agents selected for carrying it into effect. The character to which I allude is Tom Walker. Shylock only wanted his pound of flesh as nominated in the bond, but our gold robbers, like Tom Walker, want all the flesh.

You may ask, who was Tom Walker? He was a Boston man, who was meaner than the devil, as was proven in this wise: According to Washington Irving, our American Walter Scott, Tom Walker was a Boston usurer who formed a partnership with the devil to discover Captain Kidd's treasure and open a broker's office in Boston on condition that they should divide the profits for a long term of years, at the end of which time Tom was to deliver himself up, heart, body, and soul, to the devil as part of the contract.

Tom had a wonderful run of business and made immense sums of filthy lucre, but some time before the contract expired he was driving such a hard bargain with a poor, helpless debtor that the devil himself got enraged that any one should be meaner than he was, and in his wrathful indignation he mounted a big black horse during a dark, howling storm, dashed up to the broker's office, and, snatching Tom by the hair of the head, bore him off to hell.

It is needless, Mr. Speaker, to say that I am as indignant at the treatment of silver as the devil was on that occasion, and that I am for unlimited coinage of silver first, last, and all the time; against President Cleveland, the bondholders, national banks, the world, the flesh, the devil, and Tom Walker. [Laughter and prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announcing the passage, without amendment, of the bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the special order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, is it to be bimetallism or monometallism? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] the other day, as I gathered from the opening sentences of his able speech—and I have not taken the pains to verify impressions by the RECORD—seemed to regard us all substantially of one mind in respect of the double standard; all for it. From that initial assumption he proceeded with his argument. Had his colleague [Mr. WHITING] or the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DARGAN] preceded instead of immediately following him in debate, I should have expected my accomplished friend to devote a portion of his time, at least, to a discussion of gold monometallism as remedy for existing monetary and commercial troubles.

The discussions of the silver question at this as well as the other end of the Avenue have not, to my mind, evinced such unanimity. True, the Secretary says we have two hundred and twenty million silver dollars and we must use them. But, sir, there is a world of difference between We could not if we would, and the companion sentence, We would not if we could. The definitions of a word are often as wide apart.

Let us not be confounded by terms. The free, not gratuitous, cutting of both metals into coins of full legal-tender capacity and parity of value is one thing; the unrestricted minting of one into money, and the use of the other, if at all, only for subsidiary purposes, is quite another thing.

Both have their adherents in Congress as well as out. Because of this fact, which, in my opinion, divides the counsels of those who should be united, I propose to begin back of the starting point of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and inquire whether a choice between these two unpronounceable isms is open to us, meanwhile gleaning what truths I may from the field of inquiry bearing upon other aspects of the issues involved in the pending measure.

The founders of this Government were not novices in monetary matters or unfamiliar with the laws of trade and commerce. They had been trained in the school of a severe and varied experience.

The Colonies, either by express grant or assumption of authority, severally exercised the rights of the sovereign respecting coinage and money. Their right to coin money and to emit bills of credit, making them, as well as gold and silver, a legal tender, if ever questioned, early came to be universally recognized even by the mother country. Colonial mints were few in number and fabricated only the smaller coins. Massachusetts Bay and perhaps Maryland minted shillings, sixpences, and threepences. Some of the Colonies—I think South Carolina for one—had coining done abroad. But the coins of the others, such as had any, were generally of the lowest denomination—pennies, made of copper and of brass.

But, limited as the mints were in number and capacity, they supplied the means to make "cheap money." The cry for the "debtor's option" was abroad in the land in colonial times as well as now, and was heeded. The complying answer was a curse, except as a lesson of warning. Massachusetts Bay, 1652, was the first to respond in the mintage by putting ten pence in a shilling instead of twelve. Ten years later Maryland, in the language of the poet, "saw her and went her one better." She made a shilling out of nine pence. These two Colonies soon discovered that the first of the sisterhood had outwitted them. Virginia, without a mint, seven years before Massachusetts began to divide her silver into more piles and call that increasing her wealth, had made, by legislative edict, six shillings out of a Spanish dollar, that everybody knew never before contained five.

What man hath done man can do again. Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and North Carolina, improving on the Virginia patent, declared the same dollar to have seven shillings sixpence, and directed their good people so to receive them. New York, still improving the device, added six pence more to the output, and extracted from this same identical "Spanish-monument dollar" eight shillings—that is, in her alleged mind. So it went. Of course the currency became a complication. Robert Morris, the superintendent of finance under the Confederation, says a knowledge of it became "a kind of science." In a report to Congress in 1782 he graphically sketches one result—by no means the worst, but the very reverse of that aimed at in altering the shilling—of this scheme of making money cheap to help the poor, as follows:

> The ideas annexed to a pound, shilling, and a penny are almost as various as the States themselves. Calculations are therefore as necessary for our inland commerce as upon foreign exchanges; and the commonest things become intricate where money has anything to do with them. A farmer in New Hampshire, for instance, can readily form an idea of a bushel of wheat in South Carolina weighing 60 pounds and placed at 100 miles from Charleston; but if he were told that in such situation it is worth 21 shillings and 8 pence he would be obliged to make many inquiries and form some calculations before he could know that this sum meant, in general, what he would call 4 shillings; and even then he would have to inquire what kind of coin that 4 shillings was paid in before he could estimate it in his own mind according to the ideas of money which he had imbibed.

In the confusion, counterfeiting, sweating, clipping, and the like became common, because not easily detected, and consequent losses were severe and widespread.

The step from making cheap money out of coin to making cheaper money from paper was easy. Here again Massachusetts Bay led the way (1690). Her 40,000 pounds paper, as one of her own historians tells us, made a tender for taxes, was the forerunner of that avalanche of colonial and continental paper money so disastrous in its results before and during the War for Independence. More than four hundred million dollars of it turned to ashes in the hands of the people. Be it said, however, to the credit of the Old Bay State, that not a dollar of this was of her issue. She redeemed every sou of her bills.

Against the operation of natural laws of trade and money, and in support of the colonial legislation, penal enactments were directed. The severest penalties were denounced for violations. It was all in vain. Confiscation would not keep at home the Yankee shilling in Massachusetts, nor would capital punishment or pilloried barbarity suppress counterfeiting—invited as we now invite it—in Pennsylvania.

But out of all the errors, all the losses, all the sufferings came the lesson: Money can not be made by juggling with the mints or tricking with the coins; came the lesson: Commerce legislates as well as Congress—not for a colony, not for a nation alone, but for all men: she can not learn geography, but she knows arithmetic by heart: she has little need for the Statutes at Large, but delights in a measure and a pair of scales: her eyes are blinded to laws in conflict with her own. The tenpence-shilling, ordained the Puritans, shall equal the English coin of twelve pence. But the ordinance was to her a Roman edict hoisted beyond the range of vision. Commerce could not read it; but she could weigh the shilling—and she did it. Came the recognition of the infinite wisdom of God's law:

> Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small; thou shalt not have in thy house divers measures, a great and a small; but thou shalt have a perfect and just weight—a perfect and just measure shalt thou have.

And out of all these and other evils came the Constitution, with its great money-chart.

A change for the better had set in before 1787. Says an author, speaking of that period:

> Specie was abundant among the people; the foreign armies had brought large quantities of gold and silver into the country, while foreign loans had largely added to the stock of gold and silver.

This is perhaps an overstatement, but quite in the line of fact. Thomas Paine wrote, April, 1782:

> The progress and evolution of domestic circumstances are as extraordinary as the Revolution itself. We began with paper and we end with gold and silver.

Gold and silver at the close of the war became the basis on which business was transacted; and silver predominated—the great body of the circulation being of foreign stamp. Professor Laughlin, in his recent work (1886), says of that time:

> Not only was there no prejudice against silver, but it was the metal most in common use.

Such then, imperfectly sketched, was the schooling of our fathers, and such the situation when they met to form the Constitution.

No people ever had better reason to desire reformation in their monetary laws; none wiser or abler statesmen to devise and formulate the changes needed. They wrote in the Constitution—and their words can not be too closely studied in the light of their situation and experience:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins; * * * to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

No State shall * * * coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

I invite attention to the important power of Regulation here conferred. It seems to me among other things to contemplate the use of both metals in the "money."

It would seem the general power "to coin money" inherent in government, whether expressly conferred or not, draws to it and includes the power to regulate its value and that of foreign coin, to punish counterfeiting, and make the money coined legal tender, if the very coining does not do that without further making. In the Virginia charter from King James the grant on this subject was to "establish and cause to be made a coin to pass current between the people of the Colonies * * * in such metal and in such manner and form" as the several councils might approve.

I am not aware that it was any broader in any of the colonial charters. Yet all of these several powers, so separately and expressly given or recognized in the Constitution, were freely exercised by the Colonies, to wit: The power to coin money, to regulate the value of the money coined, to regulate the value of foreign coins, to punish counterfeiting, and to impart legal-tender property. This separation of powers occurred first, or at least commenced, in the Articles of Confederation. Therein the United States—nine States concurring—were given concurrent authority with the several States to coin money and the exclusive right to regulate the value of the coins struck by Congress, as well as of those struck by the several States.

The power to regulate the value of foreign coin was not included in the grant, although as an incident of its power to regulate value Congress undertook, in the mint act of 1786, to regulate the value of copper coins fabricated abroad, and on various occasions it or its officers regulated the value of foreign coin in respect of its receipt at the public Treasury. General Hamilton, however, used the lack of the power in Congress as an argument in favor of the adoption of the Constitution.

That power, and the one to emit bills of credit and make them as well as gold and silver legal tender, remained with the States. These powers, then, came to us through the Constitution, thus separated and recognized by distinct clauses. There must have been a reason for the separation, and for the continuance of it under the Constitution. My submission is, the reason had its foundation in part in the use of the two-metal money. Foreign coins of both metals were not only in common use, but their relative values were not of easy determination. A committee of Congress, 1776, reported resolutions on this subject, one of which I will ask to insert in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the several gold and silver coins passing in the said Colonies shall be received into the public Treasury of the continent, and paid out in exchange for bills emitted by authority of Congress, when the same shall become due, at the rates set down in the following table:

	Weight.		Value.
	Dwt.	Grs.	Dollars.
English guinea, gold	5	6	4⅔
French guinea, gold	5	5	4⅝
Johannes, gold	18	0	16

The ratio here adopted, according to Mr. Horton, between gold and silver was about 15.21.

To regulate is "to adjust by rule or method;" "to put or keep in order." It is difficult to see what room there would be to regulate the value of money with but one metal in the coin. How would one go about to regulate the value as between an ounce and a half ounce of gold, or a pound and an ounce of silver, or—what is the same thing—between a bushel and a peck of wheat? To regulate is not to measure. To adjust and keep adjusted—that is, "to regulate"—a measure of silver so as always to equal in value an ounce of gold, or vice versa, is a rational proposition. The continuing question is how much silver equals in value the ounce of gold, or how much gold equals in value the ounce of silver; or, the ratio being once established, how much of either is worth half the combined value of both? In the first case, gold is the measure; in the second, silver; and in the third, something between them, or we might say both.

From this springs the idea of the "double standard," which would as appropriately be named the middle standard. To answer and to do the answers to these questions is one purpose—I am almost persuaded to say the chief purpose—of constitutional Regulation. In saying this I am not unmindful of the dictum of the late Chief-Justice of the United States in Hepburn vs. Griswold, that "regulation is a power to determine weight, purity, form, impression, and denomination of the several coins and their relation to each other," &c.

Regulation in the sense I suggest would necessarily have to do with purity, weight, and relation, but not with form, impression, or denomination. If to regulate the value as applied to coins struck by Congress, either under the Articles of Confederation or the Constitution, means in substance and effect the same as when applied to foreign coins, or those formerly struck by the several States, then the Chief-Justice was too comprehensive in his definition; for with the forms, impression, and denomination of the latter coins, foreign and State, Congress had, and of course has, nothing to do, and it devolves on him who asserts a substantial difference in meaning in the two clauses to show it. Mr. Justice Field says (Legal-tender cases):

To coin money is to mold metallic substances having intrinsic value into certain forms convenient for commerce, and to impress thereon the stamp of the government indicating their value.

Again:

The power to coin money is * a power to fabricate coins.

Still again:

The power of regulation conferred is a power to determine the weight and purity of the coins struck, and their consequent relation to the monetary unit; * * * a power which can be exercised with reference to the metallic coins of foreign countries.

Wherefore it seems to me the Chief-Justice embraced in his definition of Regulation some of the things, if not all, that pertain to the separate power "to coin money;" and that the power "to regulate the value of coins" has a special scope for operation in determining the ratio between or relative value of the two metals, and in carrying that ratio into the money as respects domestic coins, and applying it to, and thereby determining the value of, foreign coins.

I can not go into the question in my limited time of what was done during the Confederation and after it under this important power to regulate the value of money. The interpretation put upon it by contemporaneous legislation, by official acts, by public discussions is of course of the highest importance. I think one may safely affirm that from 1776, when Congress appointed a committee "to ascertain the value of the several species of gold and silver coins current in the Colonies, and the proportion that they and each of them have and ought to have"—mark the words—"to the Spanish milled dollar," down to the fixing of 15.25 as the ratio in the mint act of 1786, and on down to the changing of that ratio to 15 in the mint act of '92, every public act and every discussion having reference to regulation—and they were numerous—had to do with the determination or application of the proper ratio between gold and silver.

There was some contention as to which metal should embody the money unit. Hamilton favored gold, and Robert Morris and, I believe, Jefferson, silver. As a result—I speak conjecturally, of course—of this difference, Congress, on July 6, 1785, resolved "that the money unit of the United States of America be one dollar," without stating then of what it should be composed. The next year it was resolved "a dollar shall contain of fine silver 375.64 grains." Finally, in the act of '92, the quantity was reduced to 371¼ grains, but the money unit was embodied in both metals, though the single embodiment of it was confined to silver. But this was incidental to the main question of the true ratio, discussed with such marked erudition and perspicuity by these three eminent men, not to speak of others.

No fact of history, no condition, no argument bearing upon the question seemed to escape them. The difficulties of maintaining the two metals in the money, of upholding the double standard, were fully comprehended and weighed. Yet they adhered to that standard; never contemplated for a moment the disuse of either metal. As indicating the interest in this question I may state that from 1777 to 1793 no less than five ratios at various times were officially recommended or acted on in determining values of foreign coins. Morris, Jefferson, and Hamilton differed among themselves—the first named, 14.75; the second, 14.50; and the last, 15. The conditions, the authority under which this battle of the standards and of the ratios was thus fought, under the Confederation, were brought to us through the Constitution—the very same words being employed—and the struggle continued in the later time.

The purpose of regulation and coinage was twofold: To secure a stable measure of values and an ample medium of exchange by the use of both metals in money. Mr. Justice Clifford says, speaking of the power to coin money and regulate the value (Legal-tender cases):

That the purpose of the framers of the Constitution was to provide a permanent standard of value, which should at all times and under all circumstances consist of coin, fabricated and stamped from gold and silver.

Professor Laughlin, in the work referred to, speaking of one feature of Hamilton's report, says:

The whole object of the Secretary was to secure a metallic medium in abundance. * * * "It would not do," says Hamilton, "to adopt a single silver standard, for that would act to abridge the quantity of the circulating medium."

Whether the double standard is better than the single may be debatable. These metals, with pleasing rhetoric, have been likened to two shining coursers linked together on the highway of commerce. The figure is not inapt. A double team is steadier than a single one. It is never so fast and never so slow. The swifter steed draws ahead the slower, and the slower holds in check the swifter. But my inquiry now is not what is best, but what is.

This grant as to regulation, like that to coin, not only confers authority; it imposes duties; one of which is the duty to keep the coins of the two metals at a parity, in value so as to secure both in the circulation. To insure legal parity between the coins the ratio must spring from the commercial value of the metals. Mr. Jefferson said, discussing the ratio, what should go without the saying:

> Just principles will lead us to disregard legal proportions altogether.

The means, the true foundation to legal parity in the coins—to their joint circulation, to stability of the standard or measure of value—is the commercial ratio of the metals carried into them. There are aids. Legal tender is one, mint regulation is one, and administration is one.

It is for Congress to seek the true commercial ratio—not easy to determine at any time, most difficult at a time like this—of the metals and embody it in its coins. Anomalous circumstances may make it inexpedient to attempt it at a particular juncture, and in my judgment this is one such. But under normal and settled conditions, when the ratio determined on would give reasonable promise of permanency and effectiveness, the power should be exerted. Meantime the auxiliary means should be used; and let me say here, although perhaps not altogether in the line of this discussion, if it be the duty of Congress to so legislate as to maintain the parity of the gold and silver coins, and thereby their free circulation together, as I believe it is, it is equally the duty of the President, up to the very limit of his power, to so administer the law as to aid in the accomplishment of that end.

Therefore, if to pay out the silver dollars in discharge of public obligations would increase the present disparity in the metals and endanger the monetary parity of the coins, it is his duty, in the absence of a law commanding the contrary, to refuse to do so. If he believe such would be the result, refusal is the only course open to him. Such a course—and such I understand to be the President's—maybe in violation of Democratic pledges or expectations, or it may be to lose the fruits of Democratic victory, as has been alleged on the other side of the Chamber; but be that as it may, it is nevertheless to execute the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof. It is in aid and execution of legislation to regulate the value of coined money.

> No State shall * * * make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts.

Such had been the experience of our fathers respecting money and trade in the Colonies, that, strong as the States-rights jealousy was, the first thing they did when they came to make the Constitution was to obliterate State lines and State governments, and form the whole into one grand community as respects trade and commerce and coinage and money and personal intercourse. The rights theretofore exercised by the States in respect to these things were fully surrendered to the United States—everything except in the one particular mentioned.

The right to have both metals in money seems to have been regarded as too important, too valuable, to entirely intrust even to Congress. Hence the reservation to make gold and silver coin a legal tender. It is not affirmative, but is it any the less certain? You may say Congress has the power, under the grant "to coin money," to make gold and silver legal tender—to coin money is to make it legal tender—and by exercising the concurrent power, under a well-settled principle, thereby draws to itself the entire authority. Let that be conceded for argument's sake. But when Congress exercises the power there is no need of the States doing so. If Congress cease to exert it, why, will it not at once revive to the States? If Congress to-day should repeal the law making the silver dollar or the gold coin a legal tender, could not any or all the States at once re-establish that faculty in it within their respective jurisdictions?

It may be said Congress can restrict that faculty in either coin to a limited sum. To grant this is to agree to its right to destroy this power in the States. For what shall be the limitation? Do the words "make gold and silver a tender in payment of debts" mean the same as the words "make gold and silver a tender in payment of debts to such extent as Congress shall allow?" Then how can Congress place a restriction upon the power?

If you say Congress has always exercised that right in respect of subsidiary coins, my answer is that such coins are not money within the meaning of the Constitution, but representatives of money merely. They are not "coin" within the sense of the clause. There would be no difficulty in supporting this view by authority; but my time runs; I will not stop for that.

If the States, then, have the right to make gold and silver legal tender to an unlimited amount, how can Congress dispense with either? Can there be any doubt that gold and silver are the money of the Constitution?

But, sir, this question does not rest in construction merely. It is settled by authority. I might read by the hour from statesmen, jurists, and courts—from Hamilton and Jefferson to Blaine and Thurman—all giving affirmative answer.

A few citations must suffice. If but one were made, of course it would be from Mr. Webster. His judgment on any matter susceptible of elucidation through the reasoning faculties was entitled to the highest respect. But his deliberate conclusions on questions of constitutional law and kindred subjects were and are as solid and enduring as the granite hills under the shadows of which his marvelous intellectual development began. I quote from a speech made in the Senate in 1836, and in doing so I am not unmindful of the modern departure from his views on the question of legal tender. But he had but one chance at the question. The court had several chances. If something else may be money, it does not affect the proposition that gold and silver are. I cite him to show they are, whatever else may be, the money of the Constitution. But to quote:

> Currency in a large and perhaps just sense includes not only gold and silver and bank bills, but bills of exchange also. It may include all that adjusts exchanges and settles balances in the operations of trade and business; but if one understand by currency the legal money of the country and that which constitutes a lawful tender for debts and is the statute measure of value, then undoubtedly nothing is included but gold and silver. Most unquestionably there is no legal tender and there can be no legal tender in this country under the authority of this Government but gold and silver—either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins or notes regulated by Congress."
> This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain and of the highest importance.

The Secretary of the Treasury in 1862 said:

> The Secretary recommends * * * a series of measures looking to a * * * return to gold and silver as the only permanent basis, standard, and measure of value recognized by the Constitution. (Secretary Chase's Report, 1862.)

Another authority:

> Money in the constitutional sense means coins of gold and silver fabricated and stamped by authority of law as a measure of value, pursuant to the power vested in Congress by the Constitution. (Clifford, J., Legal-tender cases.)

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gwin vs. Breedloe (2 Howard, 38), involving the question of the right of a United States marshal to collect and pay out on execution bank notes, held, Mr. Justice Catron delivering the opinion—

> Under the Constitution of the United States, section 10—
> That one in regard to States making gold and silver legal tender—
> gold and silver coin made current by law can only be tendered in payment of debts.

The Legal-tender decisions have not disturbed the doctrine that gold and silver coin are the money of the Constitution. All that can be claimed for them is that something else may be made constitutional money besides gold and silver duly coined. No one has ventured to assert that Congress has the authority to supplant gold and silver money by paper. The true view, owing to these decisions, I submit is: Whatever else may be made constitutional money, gold and silver duly coined are; and whatever else may be constitutionally demonetized, neither gold nor silver money so coined can be.

To eliminate from or subordinate in the circulation either gold or silver is in my judgment unwarrantable. A measure that would so result could not be upheld from a constitutional standpoint. If it would be unconstitutional to provide directly that gold shall not be in the money, or silver shall not form a part of it, it is equally unconstitutional to adopt any measure that indirectly will work the exclusion of either.

My answer to the inquiry with which I began is, therefore, in the negative. Monometallism is not the ism of the Constitution.

Now, something about this bill. I am opposed to it for several reasons. It proposes, among other things, gratuitous coinage; that is, any one with silver bullion or plate can take it to the Mint and have it minted into dollars without charge or expense to him. We were driven into this policy with respect to gold because other countries adopted it; but no country coins silver in that way, and the plea of compulsion as to it does not apply. On principle there is no good reason why the Government should do this service for nothing.

Never in any country, so far as my researches have shown, did the coins of both metals circulate together under gratuitous coinage. England in 1666 passed just such an act as this, which remained in force, with slight interruptions, till 1816, but it did not keep both metals in her circulation. There must be a certain limit of charge or seigniorage with which to counteract the fluctuations in the market value of the metals that will constantly occur under the most favorable circumstances.

It was said by a French representative in one of the Paris conferences that France coined all of either metal brought her, provided the bearer "knew how to ask;" that is, was willing to pay for it.

Gratuitous coinage is cast-iron coinage. It will not do in an age of steel. Then again if we are to go into the free coinage business, why not require the Government to buy all the bullion offered at the market price, not exceeding a dollar for 412½ grains standard silver, and let what profits there might be go to the Government? Why should we legislate money into the pockets of the silver-bullion owners? I listened carefully to the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] yesterday on this point, and I still put the question, seeking information.

Our friends object to prophecy about this bill. But that is what we do respecting every other measure. We conjecture what good it will do or what bad. My friend from Missouri entered that domain himself and told us what blessings this measure will bring. I am sure he would not deny that privilege to others. At least I shall venture. My conviction is the measure would at once send gold to a premium which would fluctuate with the variance of the market value of the metals, and thereby sooner or later wholly retire it from the circulation. To cause either result is violative of constitutional Regulation. The determinative question is, Would the two metals be brought to a substantial commercial parity? If not, gold must go either out of circulation altogether or into a hampered and restricted use by special contract.

I am not altogether sure what the friends of this bill claim on this head. They have not asserted the metals would come together. On the contrary, they seem to concede they would not, as I shall show later. The argument has been that it would make no difference if they did not come together; that the legal parity would continue, though different from the commercial.

What are some of the facts bearing on the ability of the United States at the ratio of 16 "to swing the par of the metals," in the elegant and expressive phrase of Mr. S. D. Horton, whom I am proud to call my friend? When the German Empire changed from silver to gold in 1871–'73, the ratio—the market value of silver—began immediately to decline. It passed 16 in 1873, or at latest in 1874. The Latin Union, when the decline went beyond their ratio of 15½ and in addition beyond the limits of their charge for coinage—their seigniorage, were forced to close their gates to silver, or lose their gold in the circulation.

For free circulation and free coinage on a ratio substantially different from the market ratio are an impossibility. For example: If an ounce of gold metal is worth twenty ounces of silver metal in the market, you can not make in the coins sixteen ounces of silver equal one ounce of gold in value, and have them circulate together exchangeable dollar for dollar with free coinage. If one have ten dollars in gold, will he use it to pay a ten-dollar debt, if with that gold he can buy silver enough to coin ten silver dollars and have a dollar or any other sum left? The question answers itself.

The smaller states of the union struggled against closing, but they finally had to yield. France held out a little longer, but had to succumb in 1878, the ratio then having passed 17.

If Germany with her population of 45,000,000 and five hund red millions of metallic money could compel the Latin Union with its 90,000,000 people and eighteen hundred millions of coined money to close their mints by ceasing herself to coin, how can any one seriously hope that the United States can restore the par by opening its mints, now that the Union have ceased to coin as well as Germany? But no one has been bold enough to affirm it, and argument is uncalled for.

The contention is we can have free coinage and legal parity and at the same time have commercial disparity; that we may coin at 16 while the market rules at 20, for illustration. When it is answered that such a situation would bring foreign silver here to be exchanged for our gold, they reply it is impossible, for there is little silver bullion abroad, and the plate is worth more, wrought as it is, than 16 to 1, and the coins are par with gold there. The argument is plausible, but unsound. Faith in the non-importation of foreign silver seems the chief reliance of the silverites, and therefore deserves full notice.

I affirm if the present market disparity or anything like it continue, free coinage in the United States with gold and silver at a legal parity and circulating together as now (if that were possible) will bring here foreign silver coins to be minted into dollars notwithstanding they may circulate there as now at par with gold. I am willing to stake the case on the soundness of this proposition and go out of court if it is untenable. Does any one take issue?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do.

Mr. LITTLE. Nay, more; I affirm that under free coinage in the United States any situation here which would make it profitable to send silver bullion from Europe to our mints, profitable above the cost of minting that bullion at home, would bring here to be coined foreign silver coins.

The argument by which the negative of these propositions is upheld was eloquently and forcibly presented by the gentleman from Texas in the beginning of this debate some weeks ago. I do not see him in his seat. I wish he were present. It has been repeated in various forms since. The minority of the Coinage Committee present it in these words:

> Again, all the silver in Europe now in circulation as money is at a par with gold, at the ratio of 15½ to 1; that is to say, it is worth 3 cents more in a dollar there than here, as compared to gold. For this reason no silver in European countries could come to us should we restore silver to an unlimited coinage at our ratio of 16 to 1; for it is not to be supposed that France, for instance, would be willing to lose $18,000,000 in order to exchange a part of her silver for a portion of our gold, or the whole of it.

It is a fair argument and a rational basis of action if it can not be met. Nothing is surer than that 16 ounces of silver will never come from France to the United States for an ounce of gold, if fifteen and a half will buy an ounce there at all times, in all amounts, and in the hands of every holder.

The trouble with this argument is as to the truth of the major premise, as the schoolmen would say. Fifteen and a half ounces of silver in legal-tender coin are not worth in France or Germany, or any other state, to every holder an ounce of gold in the coin—I use "worth" in the sense of equal in value to. To the most important holders, unfortunately for this argument, they are worth only the market value. Let me state a fact or two, or a principle or two if you will, which may make clear this statement. An article, whether coin or anything else—I do not include things of peculiar and exceptional value—is never worth more to the owner than the cost of reproduction. This truth is universal and applies to governments as well as individuals. A silver dollar is worth to me a dollar in gold, because only it costs me that much to reproduce it. I must sell a gold dollar's worth of wheat or corn or cotton or labor or what not to get it. It is not worth that much to the Government, because it can reproduce it for less. It can now get it for 80 cents.

Therefore, to a government the coins in its treasury of either metal are worth the market value of the bullion in them plus the expense of mintage and deposit, and not a farthing more. For illustration, a million thalers of silver in the German treasury are worth to that empire only what it would cost to buy the bullion in London, take it to Berlin, mint it, and deposit the coin in its vaults, say eight hundred thousand thalers in gold. Now, if Germany could ship that million thalers to the United States, exchange them for gold, thaler for thaler, as could be done of course with gold and silver freely circulating at a parity, she could again buy the bullion, coin it, and replace the thalers in her treasury with the snug little profit of two hundred thousand in gold at the present market price, and so continue in business! If pushed for time because of other engagements, perhaps some enterprising Yankee might be found to come to her relief.

In the Paris conference of 1878 it was said Germany had fifteen million pounds sterling of silver for sale. She suspended sales the next year. Say she has now fifty million dollars. On the hypothesis stated of free circulation at par of gold and silver under free coinage what is to prevent her from sending that silver here and exchanging it for gold, dollar for dollar, at a net profit of ten millions or whatever the market would make, and repeating the operation as long as her coins continue to accumulate, which, of course, would be forever? What! Nothing in the world but her Christian self-denial and gracious forbearance to profit by our—innocence! What is true as to Germany is true as to every other state.

Are you ready, gentlemen, to take the one thousand millions of European silver? If it would come here in the bullion with a profit exceeding the expense of mintage, the coin itself will come, I repeat. There is no escape from this conclusion.

But, sir, the thalers and francs would not be exchanged for gold thaler for thaler and franc for franc. The instant effect of the law would be to drive gold to a premium. Legal parity would be a thing of the past. How this might be if the bill provided for a dollar of 399.9 grains—a ratio of 15.5, that of the Latin Union—it would be far more difficult to state. To adopt it might be the magical key with which to unlock their mints to silver and secure their effective assistance to "swing the par." This is aside, however.

Mr. Speaker, what does gold at a premium signify? I have said it meant to take it out of the circulation. Debts would not be paid in it except by special arrangement allowing for premium, &c.

Would one having a ten-dollar greenback use it to pay a ten-dollar debt if he could take it to the Treasury and get the gold with which to buy the silver to pay the debt, and have something left? When gold is at a premium, will not the greenbacks go to the Treasury precipitately for it? Inevitably. There is not silver to redeem them, and could not be for several years, with the mints in full operation on silver alone. There is not the gold. Meantime the President is charged with the execution of the resumption act.

This is not the place, I know, for partisan discussion. Money-coinage—regulation—has nothing to do with parties. It is the very mathematics of politics. But, sir, I am moved to inquire whether the President's party friends are willing to signalize his administration—the first the people have trusted to that party for a quarter of a century—with a suspension of specie payments?

The operation of this measure is not to my mind doubtful. It carries no secrets; it is an open book. It means the exchange of our gold for silver. It will take some time, but that is the eventuation. It means the silver standard. The minority of the committee seem to admit this. I quote from the "views of the minority," page 8:

> The restoration of silver here will necessarily give a demand for it that has not existed since 1873, and will have the tendency to restore it to a parity with gold, and it is believed will so restore it; but whether it be so or not it is insisted that we owe no debt that is not legally and morally payable in silver, and even should we go to a single-silver standard no harm would come of it.

Here is the confession. I have pointed out that both metals can not circulate under free coinage except at a parity; that free coinage on a ratio substantially other than the commercial and free circulation of both kinds of coin at a parity is an impossibility. It is only asserted here that free coinage would have a "tendency" to restore silver to a parity with gold. That is only conjectural. It is perfectly clear if Europe's "tendency" should be—a most likely thing to happen—to replace their silver with our gold there would be no tendency to a parity here. It would be the other way. But then we are consoled with the minority's assurance that "even should we go to a single silver standard no harm would come of it." Strange conclusion from gentlemen who in the same report have argued, and argued well, that gold and silver are the money of the Constitution. Yet there is no harm to violate the Constitution and drive away gold! Why should we not go to silver alone? There are many reasons. Like the counsel's for the absence of his client, the first is enough—it is unconstitutional.

We are a great people. We have commercial relations with all the states of the world. This intercourse will increase with the years. We trade with those using silver and those using gold and those using both gold and silver. We should be able to take what money they offer and give them what they wish without loss to either us or them. We should have gold and silver in our money. I object to silver alone, as I would object to a money in this city that would pass at par on the Avenue only or at one particular house. That might be the best place to deal; but I might not always happen to be there when I wanted to buy, or I might have a fancy or an interest to purchase elsewhere. True money is the best money, and that will go wherever there is anything to sell.

We hear talk of "cheap money," of the "debtor's option" being a great principle in economic law. It would seem to be the purpose of statesmanship, according to some doctrinaires, to provide dollars of two values, so that their great principle might have scope for operation. Sir, there is no place for two moneys—an inferior and superior. There is no room for comparison. The superlative degree is only employed. All should be the best. You had as well talk to me of cheap religion, cheap morality, and cheap virtue. There may be a demand for these in the estimation of some people, but for decency's sake do not write it in the statute.

This measure means, sure enough, as virtually admitted by the minority, a silver standard—the ultimate exchange of our gold for European silver. Exchange our gold for silver at even present rates, and you increase the nominal amount of our coin probably two hundred million—no actual increase in value.

We have now eight hundred millions of metallic money; eight hundred millions of measures of value. You would make it ten or say twelve hundred millions? You would increase the measures, but add not a dollar to the property. Here is the problem: You have 800 yards of cloth. You want it to measure 1,200 yards without increasing the quantity. Your yard-stick now goes into it eight hundred times. You want it to go twelve hundred times. There is but one way to do. Make the measure 24 inches and call it a yard.

Make your measure of value 66 cents and call it a dollar. Then you have twelve hundred million dollars instead of eight hundred. That is the colonial method of financiering, through which our fathers passed as through the valley and the shadow of death. If it be the purpose to curtail the dollar, better do it squarely. Take out 8 grains from the unit of value—80 from the eagle rather than give a 66-cent dollar exclusively of silver. You then, at least, will have the same dollar in both metals. It may not be a 66-cent dollar; it may be a 50, a 75, an 85 one; no matter, the principle is the same.

The appellation "dishonest dollar" is not just now. We are not responsible for the present price of silver. Demonetization in Germany and consequent suspension of the coinage of silver in the Latin Union chiefly caused it. Extraordinary production had something no doubt to do with it. We hold up the legal parity in our struggle; but if we should abandon gold and deliberately go to a silver standard the appellation would become just.

Whom would the bill help? Whom would cheap money assist? It is said the debtor. I deny it. True, long-time debts could be paid in cheap money. Whether that would be harder to get I pass without considering.

It will take time to fill the circulation with silver—three, four, five years, or more; for the full mint capacity, remember, is only a little rising seventy millions a year. Let me have read in this connection a letter from the Director of the Mint.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1886.

SIR: Referring to your favor of the 24th instant, you are respectfully informed that if no gold coinage was executed at the mints of the United States, and the four coinage mints were run exclusively on the coinage of silver dollars, it would be possible, working full time, with their present capacities, to coin about six million silver dollars per month.

Very respectfully,

R. E. PRESTON,
Acting Director of the Mint.

Hon. JOHN LITTLE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LITTLE. Bear in mind also that the large part of the individual indebtedness of the country is that falling presently due. The twelve hundred millions of bank discounts run from ten days to four months as a rule. Land mortgages are from one to five years. In Ohio the custom in the sale of lands is to pay one-third of the purchase money cash, a third in one year, and a third in two years, deferred payments secured by mortgage on premises sold. "Store" credits run six months or a year at furthest. These are of immense proportions. Now, what is the money loaner, the creditor, the merchant going to be about while the circulation is being filled with silver? Is he going to renew his loans and extend his credits, to be paid eventually in money of less value, with interest added, than the original sum loaned? Certainly not. Will not he want his money to invest in property that will rise in nominal value as the dollar goes down in real worth? Surely. How can the debtor get the money to pay? If capital comes to his aid it must be paid for with all the risks. Interest must go up, as all agree it does in such cases. But who profits by this? Is it the debtor? Where property is well encumbered capital will not take the risk. The owner can not borrow. The poor man without good property backing can not borrow. Foreclosures and forced sales will follow. They will depress prices. The mortgageor, the creditor, will thus be enabled to exchange their loans for property at most ruinous rates to owners. Loss, distress, ruin must follow, and it will fall heaviest on the debtor class. But there are others who will be affected. All persons with fixed salaries and incomes will suffer. All the soldiers and soldiers' widows will be cut down in their pensions. The money they receive, little enough now, God knows, will buy less—be less.

The millions of railroad employés, telegraph operators, clerks, mechanics, and laborers under salaries, ministers, teachers, will be hurt. But, greatest of all, the common laborer will suffer. Political economists tell us, and our experience teaches us, that no values are so fixed and stable as the laborer's wages. In times of such crises the capitalist can wait to see what is best for him. He is not compelled to a forced sale of anything. But not so with the laborer, not so with the one dependent upon his earnings for a living. His labor is his dependence. It is all he has to sell. He can not wait. His sales of labor must go on from day to day. His is a forced sale, and he must take what he can get, if it be only an 80-cent dollar.

But, sir, we hear much about a horizontal reduction of the tariff. How could a reduction be made more absolutely horizontal as to specific duties and those levied on gold valuations—as they are levied and would continue to be no one knows how long—than to reduce the value of the dollar? If you want to strike off the duties 20 per cent. make an 80-cent dollar; or 33 per cent., make a 66-cent dollar. I can not go into this. The industries of the country should look to this question. Ay, sir, I have no doubt they are looking to it. I know it has not escaped the vigilant eye of my colleague [Mr. MCKINLEY] on the Ways and Means.

Now, a word as to what I would do. We are told Europe is coming to bimetallism. The chairman of the Coinage Committee sees hopeful indications. My friend from New York [Mr. JAMES] hears promises from abroad. They both see hopeful signs in the east. We are, they say, coming out of the night. The eastern sky reddens with the approaching sun. There are dangers about us. We are at least secure for the present where we are. I would not take a step in the dark, not even in the twilight, but wait till the full coming of the day.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says stop coinage. Others say the same. But what would be the effect of that? I ask to have read a passage from the report of the commissioners at the conference of 1878. And let me ask you to remember who these commissioners were; Messrs. R. E. Fenton, W. S. Groesbeck, Francis A. Walker, and S. D. Horton, gentlemen eminent for their learning on this subject.

With gold ruling at 17.50 to 17.75 in terms of silver, it was held by the majority of the conference to be unsafe to coin silver at 1 to 15.5, or any other ratio near to that. In view of a divergence so wide, it was thought impossible to bring the market ratio up to the legal ratio merely by opening the mints to silver. It was indeed admitted, as expressed by Mr. Goschen, that the position involved a "vicious circle, states being afraid of employing silver on account of the depreciation, and the depreciation continuing because states refused to employ it." (Remarks of Mr. Goschen, third session.) But from the joint effect of these two causes it was the disposition of the European delegates, even of those most favorable to the restoration of silver to its proper monetary function, to observe events and await the melting away of the mass of German silver and a fortunate turn in the quotations of silver, due to a diminution of the supply, or to the continued effect of the East Indian demand.

Mr. LITTLE. To stop coinage and cease to buy the bullion would depress its price. The reasons the commissioners give for hesitating to remonetize silver would be intensified, I fear. If it was then deemed unsafe to return to silver with gold ruling at 17.50, what would be thought when ruling at 22 or 24? Our present purchases hold up the market ratio; drop them, and where will it go? Should it reach 24, should the "80-cent dollar" become a "60-cent dollar," would Europe be more likely to take silver? Could we then maintain the legal parity of our coins? There must be a point beyond which the price could not drop without endangering the parity. Destroy that, send gold to a premium, and you suspend specie payments inevitably. The experiment of ceasing to purchase seems to me to be full of peril. I for one am not willing to take the risk, at least now. The buying of twenty-four million a year is not a great burden. Let it be piled up in the Treasury for a while; it will come good when we reach the double standard, and besides, it will be a useful support for our three hundred and forty-six million legal tenders. It is no disadvantage that it is cut into coins. The expense is not great. The operation need not and should not be allowed to affect the currency. I would not attempt to force out silver beyond business demands. It is expensive and worse than useless to do that.

If Europe refuse to take silver finally, we must change the ratio; that is the whole of it. Let us wait and see. Next session will be time enough, or, if the way is still doubtful, next Congress.

Mr. Speaker, originally bullion was current as money and weighed out to takers. That was inconvenient. Men could not carry scales or assaying machinery, nor always go where they were kept. So Government undertook the work of measurement. It cut the pieces and stamped them with their weight, their denomination. That saved trouble; it was a convenience. If there were but a single metal in the world, to coin it would be simple. It is just as simple with two metals when their ratio is determined. The difficulty is to ascertain the ratio. To do the rest is the work of the scrivener, the clerk. The former is that of the economist, the scientist, the statesman. After all, it is only to ascertain the truth. I am ready to coin, ready to write; when you tell me that truth, tell me what to say, not before. Shall it be 15½, 16, or 18? We are not after conjecture or guesses, but the truth.

Individuals may properly indulge in conjecture, in figure of speech, and possibly in exaggeration. But when this nation writes, when it sends out its missives to the children of men written in letters and in substance of silver and of gold, they should contain the simple truth and nothing but the truth. If events have conspired to make inaccurate that which when written was true, its task should be to correct the error either by bringing about such conditions that the old truth will reappear or by rewriting.

That is exactly our task to-day. If the bill under consideration was an aid in that direction it would have my vote. Whatever will do that I am for. But, sir, standing here as the Representative and wielding the power of an honorable and truth-loving constituency, I declare: The great Republic, with my consent, will never either write or perpetrate a lie on its coins.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have fifteen minutes of my hour remaining, which I will give to my colleague [Mr. McKENNA], and if there be any balance remaining I will yield it to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McKENNA. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to add anything new to this debate. It would puzzle inspiration to say anything new, and I dislike, sir, to occupy the time of the House in the personal concern of an explanation of the vote I shall cast.

But, sir, there is justification for explanation both in precedent and principle. An office—my office—is a public trust, and the reason for every exercise of it as well as every exercise of it can not be indifferent to the constituency which I represent and whose interests I hope to serve. I can do no more in my situation. A pensioner of a fragment of my colleague's time, for which I thank him, I would but waste this dole of minutes in a vain attempt at anything but the most meager definition of my views—a definition inadequate indeed, and in its imperfection may be more ambiguous than silence.

The subject, sir, is one of incredible complexity, and its sure solution has thus far evaded every effort of ability, while it has engaged all and exercised all. It appears, sir, to coquet with inquiry. Its statistics are complaisant to every conclusion, and in their marvelous universality and ductility every one seeks, and every one appears to find, reason for his dogma, and conjecture riots to the top of its bent, and prophecies in gold mouths and in silver mouths proclaim great good or croak dire disaster.

In this condition, Mr. Speaker, good men, though reckless ones, dare danger in pursuit of speculative good, while interested ones, who regard only self, see their opportunity; and there is always enough evil to be complained of and to be remedied to excuse and confuse everything, and recklessness appears to be discretion, pretense passes for patriotism, and ignorance and knowledge, sincerity and simulation, receive an equal applause.

But, sir, prudent men, who risk nothing for their country except in a great stake, and who would rather incur criticism of themselves than chance a danger to it, are content to abide in the safe conservatism of letting things alone. This, Mr. Speaker, is hard at all times. It is especially hard when impatient sentiment, ready probably to become vindictive, urges or seems to urge immediate action.

That which Herbert Spencer calls the "do-something" impulse may not be the most vicious one, but, sir, it is the most urgent, and to do nothing is sometimes wise, but never can be showy. Besides, there is argument for action: What are we here for? And a Congress that dare not pass laws could indeed be condemned.

But if I may be indulged in the utterance of a paradox, I dare say that some things are best done when not done; and the true and lasting interests of bimetallism are best subserved by letting the existing law alone.

Mr. Speaker, I have read the report of the minority of the Committee on Coinage on this bill. I have also with fair attention considered the speeches that have been made in advocacy of it, and every one of them furnishes reasons to abide by the existing law. It is asserted that we need an augmentation of our present circulating medium; that we want more money.

Granted for the sake of the argument. It can be obtained in adequate amount under the existing law.

It is claimed that we should at least coin the American product. Granted again. It can be coined under the existing law. It is urged in opposition to the apprehension that this country will become the silver-dump of the world that foreign coin can not come here without loss, and therefore that it will not come. That articles of silver are too rare in design or too costly in labor to be melted. That the annual product of silver is $115,000,000; that $30,000,000 of this net is consumed by India, $25,000,000 by Mexico, and $22,000,000 by all other foreign countries and in the arts. The Mexican dollars are usually estimated as bullion. But of these one-third at least, maybe one-half, remain in coin.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is further said that not more than $50,000,000, certainly not more than $55,000,000 of the entire product remains to be coined under free coinage.

Granted again for the argument. But $48,000,000 can be coined under the existing law if the market value of silver be equal to the face value of the coins. At the present price of silver over $60,000,000 estimated in coins.

In this ample power of the existing law to produce all the benefits claimed for free coinage without, maybe, its evils. In its possession in common with free coinage of the wondrous efficacy to appreciate values attributed to a great demand of a limited supply, is its vindication and the condemnation of its repeal and of a change. But, sir, it may be said that the benefit of the law is suspended or prevented by the inability or contumacy, or in the language of a distinguished Democratic Senator, the incivism of the administration.

Granted again, but only, sir, for my present purpose, and not as a partisan fling. I leave such accusations to Democrats. I know that the sincerest intention in a complex matter may be misunderstood and criticised by interest or impatience or distress.

Not, therefore, criticising, and hoping, indeed believing, that the President and his advisers are urged by conscientious considerations of duty, but believing them to be in error, and not despairing, sir, of their ultimate conversion, I repeat for the occasion only that, granted they are guilty of incivism, the repeal of the law is not a proper remedy for a failure to enforce it. Have we no other remedy than this? I need not pause to comment upon the impotency of the statesmanship which can devise no other remedy in a government of checks and responsibilities. And what a spectacle should we soon present; to what a condition should we soon come in this seesaw of legislative effort in opposition to recalcitrant officers? We should pass from a multiplicity of dead laws and useless enactments in rapid succession to confusion, to contempt, to destruction.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand why a Republican would urge such a remedy in very opposition to an administration not his. But for a Democrat to do so would be for him to assert his party a failure, his Congress a sham, his President a humbug, or worse. Now, sir, and almost in conclusion, I say that the possible good of the present law and the apprehension of danger from its change ought to give us pause; and we should not scoff at apprehended injury. I know that evil prophecies have been made heretofore and have not been fulfilled, and evil conclusions are now confounded by the singular spectacle of a gold dollar and a silver dollar of different bullion values circulating in legal parity and at par. But the cause of this is at least disputable, and the boasting patriotism of the power of this country to achieve results that other great nations shrink from attempting is not a good ground of action. We are proud of our country and believe its resources can receive and endure the influx of all the silver of all the world, and emerge from the deluge as did the earth, but stripped and bare and to begin again.

Mr. McMILLIN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. McKENNA] has occupied all the time which remained at the disposal of his colleague [Mr. FELTON].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there is a desperate war being waged against one of our money metals. It was brought on under the lead of two creditor nations, England and Germany. The wealthy classes of those countries hold the securities of other nations and peoples to the extent of at least $5,000,000,000. This fact explains fully their determination to force the demonetization of silver among other leading nations. If the American Republic yields, their war will have a successful termination. Then all debts throughout the world must be paid in gold or its equivalent, and gold will then be double its present value.

As a nation we can not legislate upon finance without having regard to our indebtedness. With no indebtedness we might possibly meet all the demands of the future with gold alone. Being encumbered with debt, demonetization of silver means certain disaster to the nation and distress among the people. Because by demonetization holders of securities can increase the value of money they are monometallists. Because their debts can be paid much easier with two than with one metal the promissors are bimetallists. This proves that as long as there is a debt to be paid the only way to deal justly by debtor and creditor is to restore all laws that have been changed and preserve intact those that remain—as they were when the debt was contracted.

The basis of good faith is that every agreement shall be performed in the same understanding by him who receives it as by him who offers it.

In the long run, what is good for the debtor is good for the creditor also. All temporary advantage that may be unjustly gained now is sure to bring its retribution in the final reckoning, whether secured by debtor or creditor. Honesty between country and people and people and country is above all things important. We are not so poor that we can not honestly pay our debts, nor are we so rich that we can afford to pay them dishonestly. Nor will it help our case to say that to pay in both silver and gold will help or benefit this or that class. We are bound together by ties indissoluble. Together we must suffer or together we must triumph. I believe much less in classes in our cosmopolitan society than do many. We are not corralled into grades or stations or conditions where we must prance or plod throughout our whole career. There is no country on the globe where men swap places so often as in our beneficent Republic.

The debtor of to-day may be the creditor of to-morrow; he may be both at the same time. The bondholder of yesterday may be the coal-digger of to-day, and the hewer of wood and the drawer of water of to-day may be the bondholder of to-morrow. There is no manliness in our going into a frenzy of jealousy toward our neighbor in the brown-stone front who is counting his bonds and clipping his coupons while we are counting the cost and cutting the corners lest the day pass and we are not fed, for who shall say that to-morrow he may not be an hungered while we are wielding his scissors? No, sir; we are to meet this question with our honest manhood and not with sentiment or a plea of poverty. Our promises are out; they bear with them the contract of payment. If we do not meet them according to its terms in the courts of final resort, we will be placed in chancery. My complaint shall not be against men, but against manners, customs, and laws.

Ten years ago there were jugglers on the debtor side who maintained with great vigor and infinite racket that a government may pay its debts by swapping promises. These were beaten back by the logic of honesty, and on January 1, 1879, they were placed "in chancery." A decade passes and the payee comes to the front as a juggler. He makes the discovery that coin means gold, and that the only proper way to pay a coin debt is to hand over the highest-priced coin in the market.

Shall we place this new juggler in chancery? I am in favor of it. I will not stop to investigate who he is, whether rich or poor, powerful or impotent. He has undertaken a dishonest thing, and he must abandon his wicked purpose or go into chancery also. No amount of racket in imitation of his prototype, no plea of the baby act—for he was of age—will excuse him from the fulfillment of the covenant.

Truth compels me to say that these creditors should not now be in court at all. Their bargain is a good one. They have no equities here. They should ask for nothing more than their contract gives. That fact practically forces them to come into court under false colors. They affect to be much concerned for the debtor, and they fall to manufacturing calamities to be let loose upon society if coin is not construed to mean gold. Spleen takes possession of them. Their interests seem to affect their tastes.

They discover also such great enervation in our age that we can not "tote" the silver dollar. Senility and decrepitude have overtaken us, decay has wasted us until the grasshopper is a burden and the silver dollar is an intolerable oppression. As they proceed it now and then occurs to them that it will not do to be "enemy" all the time, and so by turns they become coy. They are now in the rôle of bimetallism, and "while the fit is on" they proceed to show how, by deserting the silver dollar, they can save it.

After the plan is fully developed, and after they have thus saved silver to benefit and bless mankind, they proceed with suspicious precipitation to demonstrate, to their own satisfaction at least, that silver is unfit for money. So intent are they on their high resolve that they will not even pause to swap 412½ grains of silver for one grain of certificate—just as valuable. Covered with sweat, begrimed with dust, on they trudge, pressing toward the high and holy calling of making silver odious!

Neither Hugo's Toilers of the Sea, nor yet Ixion at his wheel, ever fulfilled a destiny half so dolorous as they. Is there no inducement that will pause them in what the gentleman from Maryland designates as "indignant devotion" to their cause? Can they brook no delay? Is there no maiden's voice in all the land seductive enough to tarry them in their career "Excelsior?" Nothing in the world is easier. Luggage, more luggage, sir, will halt them. Offer them 80 grains of silver. See how they range in expectant lines! Offer to compromise by adding one-fifth to the size of their "cartwheel dollars," and mark how they wheel into column!

Before considering such of these objections to the silver dollar as my limited time will permit, I wish to refer to a single argument, and I may say the only one yet made, why the creditor is perhaps entitled to receive part of his money in gold. It is to the effect that in some of Jay Cooke's advertisements in certain newspapers he announced that interest on bonds would be paid in gold. It is not claimed that the law authorized him thus to advertise. It is not even claimed that the Secretary of the Treasury gave any such authority. Nevertheless it may be, for the sake of being abundantly fair, admitted in the argument that the advertisement should operate as a sort of estoppel against the Government and that she should keep the pledge—presuming there might have been one—made by Jay Cooke. This is going to the utmost limits of fairness toward the creditor. It is giving the benefit of every doubt as to both the facts and the law.

The real and the legal contract was on the paper at delivery and has gone with it in every transfer, no matter into how many hands it has passed. It reads: "This bond is payable in coin." What coin? "Of the standard of 1870." The standard of 1870, to which the holder was by the law directed, is: "Silver 412½ grains, 900 fine; and gold 25.8 grains, 900 fine." But now to the promises of Jay Cooke; what were they? That the Government would pay the interest in gold. What would a strict construction of this advertisement give the promisee? Certainly no one would contend that Jay Cooke undertook to assure him that the principal should be paid in gold—that which is not mentioned and not included by some general term, when part is recited by implication is excluded. Therefore the proper interpretation is that the Government shall pay the interest in gold, but the principal it may pay in other money. Does the payee prefer Jay Cooke to the contract he has on his bond? If so let him abide that—take his interest in gold and his principal in silver—whenever he can show that he was misled by an adverment.

But I am even disposed to do more. I will take the same position I did when the greenback payor was attempting to fly from the spirit of the contract. I said to them, "Now, let us take hold and make a greenback just as good as coin, then the payee will prefer it to coin, and then we can pay in coin just as easily as we can in greenbacks." As a plan of compromise with the payee now, I would say, "Let us go to work, Mr. Payee, and make silver bullion worth just as much as gold bullion, and then you can take your choice! But, says the monometallist, it can not be done, the tastes of the world have changed. England dethroned silver, Germany had to stop its coinage, and now the Latin Union have thrown it overboard! How can the United States stand for silver against the world?

Mr. Speaker, we have performed a more miraculous thing, even, than this. It was a greater achievement to resume specie payments in 1879 than it would be to bring gold and silver together in 1889. There were more who placed resumption among the impossibilities then than there now are who say silver can not be raised to a parity with gold. "It can not be done!" shouted the faithless payor in promises, in '75; "the whole world has not money enough to do it!" "It can not be done," shouts the monometallist in '85; "the world has too much money to do it."

The cry of '75 lacked pluck, but it had in it a little logic. The cry of '85 has neither pluck nor logic.

Why say we can not bring these metals together by the force of law? Not as to what the metals shall be but what they shall do?

The answer is, "The value of a thing will not be changed by law." But can not a commodity be utilized by law or custom to do things—to perform functions—it did not, or perhaps could not, without law?

The monometallist, in his moments of devotion for silver, has himself proved too much to higgle now about "fiat." His sole plan for saving silver is to force, or rather coax, the nations into a joint convention to fix a ratio between the metals and a standard for each. You see it is fiat and fraud, if the power we can exercise is used to regulate its use or value, but if a power we can not invoke will only unite to regulate its value, then it is not fiat, it is not fraud! Such is the consistency of monometallism. Does any one doubt that the dethroning of silver by Germany, and its more recent abandonment by the Latin Union, has lowered the price of silver bullion? And, if so, would not the abandonment of that metal by the United States lower its price still more? And if this be true, then, if Germany were by law to begin its coinage, would not its bullion value advance? And if it would, is it not demonstrated that a nation's mandate in this regard has potency to regulate the use and therefore the value of money? But why argue this point? The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES], who spoke on the other side, freely admits that silver bullion was made cheaper than gold solely by discrimination against it. It is at most but a difference in degree, and there is nothing left of the position but a single, cowardly "you can't."

Well, sir, we can at least try. That is what we said in '75, and the trial trip brought us into port. Then, as now, it was argued all precedent is against us. "England tried to resume under more favorable circumstances and she failed!" Sir, we have done a thousand things England never has and never will do until she has a government for the people instead of a government for aristocrats. Even the great statesman at Gramercy, as late as in '76, told us it might have been done if we had managed rightly, but we have missed our chance, said he, "and usufruct even can not save us." Nevertheless we did resume. When Grant cut loose from his base of supplies at Milliken's Bend, crossed the Mississippi River, and fought his way to Jackson and back, leaving nothing but the roads, and burned bridges behind him, even the gifted Sherman thought the army was lost. Sherman learned something new in the art of war, and lived to put his wisdom into practice when he marched "from Atlanta to the sea." It can not be done forges chains. It shall be done breaks them. The former has written the history of bondage; the latter builded the temple of freedom!

THE DISHONEST DOLLAR.

But you tell us 412½ grains of silver make a dishonest dollar. This is a grave charge, and if you can only make it good I think you can safely rely on great accessions to your vote in this House. As you seem to stand greatly in need of votes it occurs to me that here is a profitable field for the exercise of your best energies. Vociferous allegation, however, is not proof, nor will you be likely to deceive any one into mistaking the one for the other. The 412½-grain dollar has a history which may be easily traced. If it has been in bad company and by contamination corrupted, or if it was depraved and a cheat from the start, too prominent has been its career to permit deception in either. The burden is clearly with you, but as we have nothing to conceal and as you seem somewhat laggard in getting to your real task, we may as well direct your attention to some sources of information and invite you to probe further if you like.

The first objection you make to the silver dollar is that it is a "fiat" dollar. We reply by insisting that there is intrinsic value in it. It has all other important qualities in it that go to make money. It is indestructible. It does not corrode by the touch of time. It costs labor to secure it. It is the product of sweat-drops, and daring and pluck and suffering. Still you insist that though it be a costly thing, yet any way it is one-fifth fiat. This is a stunner; the honest man rubs his eyes and says, "Perhaps now there is something in that." We must therefore go farther and investigate.

The Second Congress of the young Republic made our first money. How much pure silver did that Congress put into its dollar? Hamilton was then the financial head of the Government. He recommended 371¼ grains of pure silver as the dollar. That was on the 28th day of January, 1791. The report is full of good logic. It reads like the thoughts of one skilled in finance, like one who has sought the opinions of great minds and digested them. The Congress has a very high opinion of his abilities, for, after much debate, on the 2d of April, 1792, it indorses Hamilton's recommendation and enacts into law "that 371¼ grains of pure silver shall be a dollar."

Examine, now, the silver dollar that you have called dishonest. It has in it 371¼ grains pure silver. Now, where is the fiat? Oh! but you say, "I have a gauge hidden away in a stocking that makes that dollar 20 per cent. fiat, notwithstanding your ancient law and your 371¼ grains of silver." Very well, bring on your gauge, sir. Let us test it. Assertion does not establish gauges; gauges are subject to tests as well as the thing gauged. Gold being your gauge, let us examine its history and its capacity to measure. When Hamilton made the report to which we have referred he recommended 24¾ grains of pure gold for the gold dollar. Congress adopted his suggestion. In 1834 another Congress took from the gold dollar 1.5 grains of pure gold, because as a measure of value it did not seem to work well. That is some proof that gold as a measure is not infallible. Examine your gold dollar of to-day and you find only 23.2 grains of pure gold in it.

Again, to make gold what it could not be without fiat it was ordained by law in 1873 that gold should measure everything. Law said to it, "Be thou the unit," and it was the unit! Since that time it has been measuring everything incorrectly with unvarying consistency. To illustrate: let us take 23.2 grains of gold bullion and go forth to purchase. What will it do? Too much or too little, or just enough? You buy wheat, flour, corn, meal, calico, scythes, axes, labor, anything you need. What have you in return for your dollar? You make your comparison from the time your 23.2 grains was stamped with the dollar fiat, and you find that you have cheated the producer of the commodities you are taking home out of at least 20 cents. You are taking home $1.20 worth of labor and the product of labor for your 23.2 grains of gold! What is the matter? I can tell you, sir. You are a fiatist. You have, somehow, forced a value into 23.2 grains of gold bullion that does not belong there, and that something is law, is fiat! Fiat may be imparted to a thing, you see, without stamp or die; it may boost bullion uncoined as well as bullion coined.

Now I will take my 371¼ grains of silver bullion and I will go to the producer and I will buy wheat, flour, corn, meal, calico, scythes, axes, labor, anything I need, and I make my comparison with what 371¼ grains of silver would do for my fathers. I go back, not to 1834, for my dollar is dignified with more years than yours, it dates from 1792, but I will only cover a period we can all recall. I make my comparisons, and what have I in return for my 371¼ grains of silver? Have I cheated the producer? Has the producer cheated me? Has fiat played a part in the bargain? No, sir! I have 100 cents' worth of that which will supply my wants and the producer has 100 cents of value in return for it. Thus that "silver bodkin" has punctured the gold bullion balloon and the collapse develops some dishonesty where blind prejudice never expected to find it. Can it be true, I wonder, that this yellow metal which catches its rays from the sun is destroying the eye of honesty?

GOLD THE FIAT MONEY.

The fiat in money or money material is the law mandate added to intrinsic worth. Intrinsic value is made up of cost and use. An article may cost a good deal and may be of very little value. Gold and silver, fourteen years ago, were of the same value, on a ratio of 1 to 15, for on the ratio of 1 to 16 as they were then by law arranged silver was at a premium of 3 to 4 cents. About this time the fiat of Germany sent gold ahead of silver. The United States, always more or less inclined to ape despots, stepped into the trap set for her and added by the act of February 12, 1873, her fiat to gold. The equal law silver had theretofore enjoyed with gold was changed into unequal law in behalf of the latter. But this was not all. The act of 1873 did more; it provided for a new unit of values; that is, it added to the use of gold not only by subtraction from silver but by affinitive addition to gold. This mysterious statute that knows not its maker not only robbed silver of law but forced increased use or double duty upon gold by law. Then, that silver might be still more crippled, the free coinage of gold was continued while that of silver was discontinued, and when in '78 coinage of silver was resumed its coinage was curtailed while gold continued free.

To recapitulate, gold has secured of that hated thing its worshipers are now pleased to call fiat, in addition to that which has been vouchsafed to silver:

First. The exclusive fiat of most of the great commercial nations of Europe.

Second. In this country its unbroken free coinage.

Third. Its increased use consequent upon the disuse of silver from '73 to '78.

Fourth. Making it by the act of '73 the unit of value.

Fifth. The present free coinage of gold and the limited coinage of silver.

Thus, while the gold bullion has beside all the fiat monarchies can give, and four distinct and independent mandates of law in the United States that silver knows not of, is it a wonder that 23.2 grains of gold buy too much, that it is dishonest, that it cheats the laborer and producer?

I find by a table published in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]—the correctness of which no one on either side will question—that the cost of sufficient of the necessaries of life to support a family of four persons, the number taken in the estimate, has been constantly on the decline, as measured by a gold standard, since 1873. The cost is estimated, in 1873, at $294.60; in 1874, at $291.69, and so on down to 1885, at $216.11. This shows a decline of over 33 per cent., an amount exceeding the difference between the value of gold and silver bullion, and demonstrates that silver bullion comes much nearer a correct measure of values than that of gold bullion.

The decline in production of gold, together with the increased demands for it in the arts, would of itself have made it too dear for a safe single standard. Its equilibrium should have been preserved so far as honesty would permit by the largest possible use of silver and the least possible use of gold as money. The fiat which added to the price of gold should have gone to the aid of silver. Gold needed no aid; its tendency was to become too high, at least for the time being. True loyalty to both metals would have said the weaker and not the stronger shall have the aid of the law until such time as a change in relative production shall enable both to stand without law, or at least with equal laws. But it seems that avarice, and not chivalry, controlled. Therefore fiat must make the dear dearer and the cheap cheaper. It only remains now to compel all debt payments to be made in the former and avarice will have conquered all obstacles—its triumph will be complete.

Oh, sir, it is the old story of tyrants. They never wrong without despising the object wronged, whether animate or inanimate. In the old days, when men's limbs were bound in chains, the master gloated in grim satisfaction over the inability of the manacled to run with him an equal race. With no law that financial ministers are bound to respect, see how their imitators of our time point their index fingers and leer at silver because gold, its law-panoplied brother, outdoes silver bullion in its ability to measure and to buy.

In this connection I will have published the following letter from Judge Dexter, of Elmira, N. Y. I know him well. He is a thorough student, and perfectly fearless in the expression of his opinions. His questions are so tersely put upon this proposition that the correct answer is irresistible. [See Appendix.]

WHO ARE TRUE BIMETALLISTS?

The world has none too much of both metals to answer the purposes of money. Both may be used to the entire extent of their production, excepting only such as the arts absorb, without inflating the circulating medium. They can take the place of currency now in circulation in fact or by certification, or they can be used to increase it, according to our necessities. In my opinion there can be no such thing as inflation before the country, either with the metal dollar itself or by certification thereof, or by greenbacks or by national-bank bills, has behind it a redeeming coin worth 100 cents on the dollar.

Believing thus, I would use every dollar of both metals that will come to the mints for money, save only when by some abnormal condition of things, induced by unjust and unequal laws of other nations, there is danger of forcing a disparity which would work harm. At all such times I would so legislate as to protect our people against that evil, for evil I must admit it to be. Free coinage I would always have in view, and abandonment of either metal I would in no case permit.

The bill which I have introduced, together with extracts from letters I have written to journals in my district, I will print in the appendix. They express fully my position and the step which I think we should take at this time. While I would prefer to vote for free coinage, I doubt our ability to control the price of bullion by additional use beyond the amount produced in this country. As to our own production I have no fears whatever.

Now let us examine the philosophy of those who profess bimetallism, but who, to secure the proper status of silver, advise its present discontinuance as money. This is substantially the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. A man thrown overboard by a common enemy is struggling manfully against the tossing waves. You rush for the life-boat and go forth to his rescue. You take him on board, claim him as a dear friend, and push for the shore. Reflection gives you pause. You are sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought. You are convinced that the enemy, as an enemy, must have had the best of reasons for getting rid of him, and so, as his friend, you conclude the true way to save his life, after all, is to toss him into the sea, and then after the storm has passed negotiate with the enemy upon some general plan of salvation!

To illustrate still further: Silver is partly down. You think it should be lifted to its old position, therefore you join the cry against its fitness for money! Gold has been appreciated by an increased demand for it by the creditor nations; they first force up its price and then demand that all payments shall be made in that metal; therefore you will join the creditor nations and force it still higher; and this you say will bring silver and gold together.

England and Germany have lost their faith in slver as money, therefore you will now prove your faith in silver for money by serving it just as England and Germany have served it. The price of silver as measured by gold, has been forced down by legal discrimination, therefore you will discriminate in the same way to force it up! That is to say, you will agree to tear silver down so that, being down, you may join with its enemies in restoring its ancient glory! This plan of proving undying devotion to silver I am afraid will hardly carry you through the fall campaign.

I can easily understand how a man may believe in unimetallism; how he may enlarge upon the importance of stability until all other considerations vanish from his estimates of what constitutes good money; but how a man can despise the dollar and hanker after it, how demand its destruction and pray for its restoration, is a conundrum I have been quite incompetent to solve.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] is decidedly candid in the matter and much more consistent than some of those who will vote with him.

In his position he is joined by my colleague [Mr. SCOTT]. They talk glibly about "evolution" and the "survival of the fittest," and the latter gentleman is quite Darwinian in his discussion, as well as "quite English." He proclaims an "irrepressible conflict," but graciously admits, "How easy it is to be mistaken." It is certain, according to the gentleman, that silver must go—if he is not mistaken! But the gentleman from Maryland boldly advocates unimetallism, and closes one of the very best speeches yet made or likely to be made on the wrong side of this question by summoning to his aid the prophet Daniel's "colossal beast," which had been the "baseless fabric" of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, with which to bolster the financial schemes of our Daniel, who presides over the gold-headed beast at the other end of the Avenue. He tackles the "buzzard bummer"—sometimes called a dollar—and scatters it with more remorseless vigor than all the pent-up winds that must split themselves in blowing for "Beck's blizzard." [Laughter.] He declares with a terseness of expression which I commend to those who are halting in the hope of an international conference, that all maneuvers to bring it about are like "snatching at the moon."

And so the plan suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES], is characterized by the gentleman from Maryland as "snatching at the moon!" Surely this is a flattering prospect for these gentlemen. The gentleman from New York, while he held the floor and yet had a half hour at his disposal, was asked: "What he would do in the event of the failure of his proposed international conference?" He neither told us where, in such a stress, he would turn, nor did he give us any rational ground for a hope of such a conference to begin with. It is fair to say he told us that some friends (?) of bimetallism in Europe, notably Cernuschi, had advised us to stop the coinage of silver. For one, I neither follow the opinions of interested parties in the Old World upon the silver question, or the tariff question, or any other question, unless they bear such evidence of sincerity, and abundant reason for their professed faith, as to dissipate a natural prejudice I have against "walking in the way of sinners"—from abroad.

The gentleman from Maryland is clearly right. If we are to save the silver dollar at all, we must do so by proving that its use, and not its disuse, is a blessing.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

I am troubled, sir, with a suspicion that there is a design lurking, perhaps, in the outskirts of definite purpose to prolong, if not to perpetuate, our national debt. During the present administration, a policy only less clearly outlined by its predecessors, has succeeded in paying, instead of as much as was possible just as little as possible of the debt. Seventy or eighty millions might have been paid; only twenty millions during its first year has been paid.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, complains at the presence of available debt-paying material which haunts his peace of mind, and yet he will not let it go. Why does he hesitate to use it? I can account for it only on two grounds. First, his conscience may tell him it is not all honest money; and, second, he may have espoused the theory that a national debt is a national blessing.

I have already given my views as to the honesty of the silver dollar, but I desire now to consider it in the part it was intended to play in the payment of our national debt.

The letter of the contract, it is not doubted, gives the option of the Government to use either of the coins to pay on the debt. It not only named what the debt might be paid in but referred to the standard, which includes the number of grains and the fineness thereof. If a dispute should arise between business men upon the construction of such a contract the courts would quickly determine the duty of both. A parallel will, I think, assist us in a clearer understanding of the situation. Two business men, one a farmer and one a dealer in produce and stock, enter into a bargain.

The dealer in stock has a span of horses which he offers to the farmer for the price of $200, payment to be made in December following, and agrees to take in payment therefor grain, as follows: Wheat at $1, barley at 80 cents per bushel, each of quality of the grain in the presence of and examined by both parties. The team is present also, is examined by the farmer, and he concludes to take it upon the terms named. Seed-time and harvest have come and gone. The farmer has thrashed his wheat and his barley. Since the spring-time, when the bargain was made, wheat has advancerd 10 cents, barley has declined 10 cents. With the purpose of being abundantly fair the farmer concludes that, although he knows he can insist upon the stock-dealer taking all his pay in barley, he will deliver it in about equal proportions as it makes little difference to him.

The first load, therefore, which he brings his creditor is all of wheat. Of course the stock dealer is pleased, he smiles, rubs his hands, compliments the appearance of the team and suggests that the farmer made an excellent bargain when he got that team. The next installment to be applied upon the debt comes on the morrow. It is barley. Stock-dealer is unsocial, he is actually uncivil, but remembering his contract he bites his lip and prepares for the worst. He does not really want barley at any price. Since wheat has gone up he has taken a great dislike to barley. He concludes to take it, however, provided he can get enough of it. Accordingly he brings out his six-quart measure and suggests to the farmer that he "will compromise by taking his bulky barley provided he will add that six-quart measure heaping full to each bushel." The farmer feels that the jury would aquit him if he should thrash the ground with the anatomy of the stock-dealer, but he holds his temper that he may get the true inwardness of the stock-dealer's ethics.

"Suppose," says the farmer, "that barley had gone up, would you have refused barley?" "Oh, no," says the stock-dealer, "it would have been a very different thing then!" "I see, I see," says the farmer. "If wheat goes up you want wheat. If barley goes up you want barley! Suppose they had both gone down?" "Oh, then you should have paid me in corn. Corn is grain, just as much as wheat. Corn is holding its own. I would have accepted corn!" "I see, I see," says the farmer, "grain is any thing that is up!" Your plan gives me the option and gives you the profit!"

The only difference between the man who insisted either on having all wheat or six quarts extra of barley and the man who demands all gold or 20 per cent. more of silver is, that the wheat demanded by the stock-dealer had gone up by the force of the laws which we call supply and demand, while the gold, which is now insisted must be paid our creditors, has gone up by the force of the same laws, and the fiat of human legislators added thereto at the behest of the creditor!

HOW SHALL THE DEBT BE PAID?

I contend that, since there is an actual difference in the values of gold and silver bullion, to pay the debt in both products, share and share alike, would be so fair and equitable to the creditor that instead of complaining he should be filled with gratitude. It is more than Shylock demanded, it is more than is in the bond, but it is what the Government may easily pay; it is just the way to keep the prices of bullion together, and what, if she is permitted to pay, will neither wrong her creditors, nor impair her honor. No court of equity in the world, upon the same contract between individuals, would exact or decree even so much. Why attempt to enforce a system of morals or ethics touching a contract with the Government not maintainable in a court of equity as between individuals?

GOVERNMENT ETHICS.

It is said, however, there is a wide distinction between a contract by people with a sovereign and one between individual with individual. The Government being the sovereign power, charged by the Constitution with the duty of coining money and regulating the value thereof, it is said that the duty rests with her to pay her debts with that which has 100 cents value in each dollar. Waiving for the time being the question whether it is not gold that is too high instead of silver below 100 cents, let me say that to the proposition in general I yield hearty assent. It is the duty of the Government to exercise its sovereignty to the fullest possible extent to make any coin she agreed to pay her debts with just as valuable as her sovereign power is capable of making it. Beyond that she is under no obligation to go. Having agreed that her debts shall be paid in coin of certain standard, she is bound to impart to that coin, whether gold, silver, or copper, all the value her mandate can give it. There is no obligation resting upon her to change the standard of metals in use or change the metals to be used. The former is honestly exercising sovereignty; the latter might be—must be—dishonestly exercising it.

Having stated the proposition, are the gold men willing to abide by it? That they are not is the cause of the difference now dividing debtor and creditor. In 1873 they demanded, and their representatives here yielded to the demand, that the very sovereignty which had been imparted to one of the dollars she had stipulated to use in payment of her debts should be withdrawn. If this had not been done at the behest of those who were interested in demonetizing silver, or if the silver dollar had failed to perform full money function, then there would be great reason to complain. Having, however, asked that it be done, its effect should be accepted by the creditor, no matter what the consequences may be.

The only thing the Congress could do under the circumstances was to restore the legal-tender quality to silver at the earliest possible moment. This it did, and this quality she is bound by her obligation to her creditor to maintain. But here comes in the strangest anomaly in the history of legislation upon finance. The creditors are again complaining that there is too much fiat in the silver, and they want some of it taken out. They want it done evidently so they can say in the future, "the Government was bound to exercise her sovereignty in behalf of her money; having betrayed silver we now demand that the Government make good the difference between silver and gold bullion." This may be illustrated by reference to a brief debate on the 15th day of February, 1878, when the present law was under discussion between Senator Blaine and others:

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir; but let the public creditor come face to face with you and he can say to you, "silver and gold were equally meant in that bond." I so hold; but he can say to you, that you, representing the Congress of the United States, have destroyed the value of silver in the markets of the world. It was your demonetization that discredited it. It was your act.

Mr. MATHEWS. We will put it back.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah, but you can not put back the same thing. You have done what you can not undo. The public creditor can come face to face with you and say that when you, with your power, by your act discredited silver, it was more valuable than what you agreed to give him, but that by your sovereign power, over which he had no control whatever, you destroyed the value of that article, and after you had destroyed it, after you had taken out its paying and purchasing power you turn around and say, "We will restore it because it is below what it was, and we will force it upon you because it is nominated in the bond."

Thus the incisive logic of Senator Blaine showed the dishonesty of demonetization in its application to the creditor. Are gentlemen ready to move into the trap again? Says the proverb, "If a man cheat thee once thou art perhaps not to blame; if he cheat thee twice thou art a fool." Once was the American Congress wheedled into demonetizing silver. By chance we escaped from the consequences of its violation of sovereign obligation before injury had come to the debtor or creditor. If the abandonment of silver had been so long as to force a disparity between silver and gold, as money, then the Government would have been under the highest obligation to have made good the difference, at least to all innocent creditors.

HOARDING GOLD.

The alarm was sounded a year ago by the incoming President that gold was certain to leave the country unless the silver dollar got out of its way. His alarm was taken up by the Eastern press and soon spread to this Chamber. Our chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in the expiring hours of the Forty-eighth Congress, became panic stricken. He rushed into this Chamber with the "sundry civil appropriation bill" under his arm, and, with the multitude of improper matters already weighing it down, proposed to encumber it still further with practically a repeal of the act of 1878. Since then the clamor has been going on with increasing vehemence, until now the President declares that "gold is hoarding," and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] goes one better and says "it is hoarded." Now, of course, it would be presumptuous to question the President's assertion, but I will venture to take issue with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], since it is only a guess on his part evidently, and at guessing I am equal to any Congressman, although in that regard I would not presume to pit myself against a President.

Why say gold is hoarded? Because it is not in our pockets? It never was there. It never was a popular circulating medium. When anything else can be used as well, gold always keeps out of sight. Its certificate is out and in use, however. I have not heard of its being refused when wanted. Gold is held in reserve by the Government and in the banks the same as silver, and I have yet to hear of any person charging, or at least receiving, a premium for any. So that if there be some truth in the President's guess that it is hoarding, it is not likely to stay long if it finds it is making nothing by the dodge. But suppose now the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] is quite right, that the "reluctant lover," though not gone over the sea, has "waved his parting and final adieu to silver" and gone into stockings, what is to be done? Shall we say to silver, "Go thou, also?" If silver be really all the money we have that will stay with us to maintain specie payments and pay our debts, shall we by law unfit it for these purposes? Are we ready to do without any money whatever? Shall we try our hand again at running our business on promises? "Gold is hoarding," says the President! "Gold is hoarded," shouts the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT and Mr. EVANS], and so the cry goes round and round, until, if any man has a dollar of the stuff about him, he concludes that unless he gets it into a stocking at once it will fly out of the window.

Now, let us see if these worshipers of Nebuchadnezzar's beast do not prove too much again. Assuming that gold has already gone into its hole and pulled the hole in after it, has not the body-politic been wounded about as much as it can be by this "reluctant lover's adieu?" May it not as well be across the deep as to be out of use? I see no difference, except that if it should get over its fright once it might get into our pockets quicker if it only had to come out of the stocking than if it had to recross the seas to get there. I will not stop to discuss whether on some accounts it might not be better even for us that it had gone to foreign countries rather than into hiding, seeing that if it had gone it would probably have sent us silver back in exchange for it. That would be to wander from the question.

Gentlemen having made themselves believe that gold has gone into disuse, how is it to be gotten into use again? Will the demonetization of silver bring it forth? It is now cornered; will demonetization of its brother metal bring it from its corner? Let us see. Wheat and corn are our stable products for food, just as gold and silver are our staple products for money. The hoarders of wheat get a corner on that commodity—it is held for speculation. How shall the people break the combination and get wheat out of the corner? "Destroy corn—destroy corn—that will break the back of the combination," says the president of the wheat exchange. "Amen! amen!" shout the believers in a single commodity, and all the worshipers of gold say, "Amen! amen!"

Ah! Mr. President and gentlemen, do you not see that the cornering business is just what all the fight is about? Speculators delight in "corners!" Shall we pave the way for their projects? Destroy the corn-cribs of the great West to-day and there will be a corner on wheat to-morrow. Wheat will remain in the bins or the consumer will pay just what the manipulators of the corner see fit to charge for it. Two metals are used for money; one has been forced up by the ordained partial disuse of the other. Now, ordain the entire disuse of the other and the speculator's corner on the yellow metal is complete. It is high now; it will be higher then. It is hard to get now; it will be harder to get then. Every dollar of it has been mortgaged to pay debts; much of it is already in the hands of the mortgagee. He is but human, and will get for it all he can. There is no other money; this we must have; we are at his feet!

Such are the prospects held out before us, for us and for our children, by the monometallists.

WHO ARE THE DEMAGOGUES?

Each of the gentlemen who have taken the unimetal side in this discussion is haunted with the fear that some one is going to play the demagogue. This comes from the nature of their case. Well knowing that they are pushing the cause of the few against the many, they naturally fall into hedging. Therefore they first condemn the demagogue and forthwith rush into playing his tricks. Read, sir, almost any of the "gold speeches" made on this floor, and you will find whole pages devoted to disasters that will come trooping in upon the laboring man if the silver half of our money is not turned out of doors. They fall into rapturous devotion for the laboring man. For him their words are as the sands of the sea, but their logic, I am forced to say, is all for the holders of promises.

My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVANS], not to be outdone by his colleague [Mr. SCOTT] or the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], who had fairly covered the whole ground, devotes page after page of the RECORD in portraying the calamities sure to follow upon the heels of depreciated currency, as if any disputed the point with them. Has any one denied that a depreciated money injures the laborer? I have not defended depreciated money. But what shall we say of the calamity that must follow in the train of a depreciated currency when compared with the desolations that come from stringency of money? Ah, sir, it takes no long arguments, no complex tables, no hair-splitting logic to convince a laboring man that when money is scarcer he works too long and too hard to get dollars, even if he gets them at all.

But I am not content to allow the insinuation that the friends of silver are in favor of depreciated money go without answer. It is mere assertion. How is depreciation in money to come about, let me ask? By disparity between gold bullion and silver bullion out of which money is coined. What has brought the disparity we have at present in these metals? The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] tells us, and tells us truly, that it is the discrimination of European nations. Silver was worth more than gold when it was assailed by Germany, although England had been warring in vain against it for half a century. He says the war upon silver was a cruel blunder, that it has brought distress to the laborer and disaster to the monometal nations. True, he is flying in the face of the opinion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], my colleague [Mr. SCOTT], and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who each fall into excessive admiration over the financial policy of both England and Germany. Nevertheless, they do not deny that gold bullion has been appreciated or silver bullion depreciated by the discriminations against the latter. With what propriety, then, can "disparity" be brought in as a text from which gentlemen on the other side may preach a sermon against depreciated money?

The gentleman made a magnificent assault upon depreciated money. It was a cruel indictment, however, of his own side of the case. Disparity will come, if it come at all, from free coinage of gold and non-coinage of silver. He hurls his rhetoric with masterly skill and abundant profusion against a disparity imagined, and proceeds to urge a plan of legislation that will inevitably bring a disparity real. Whence came disparity of bullion, which threatens disparity in money? I take his own words: "Its (silver) present fall is largely due to its demonetization by Germany and France," and his logic is to save it from further fall we must follow Germany and France. I leave him to wrestle with his new-found law that like causes do not produce like effects.

But to be entirely candid with him it should be admitted that he assumes that by suspension there may come such a shock to these countries that they will make haste to retrace their steps, for he says:

If by suspension you can drive these countries to an international arrangement you will take the best step toward stopping depreciated currency.

And so my friend with all his ingenuity and his admitted ability can only offer an "if" upon which to hang a hope of escape from the calamities of depreciation. Well! well! The case looks desperate indeed. It adds to our embarrassment when we remember that demonetization complete is just what will benefit the ruling classes of England and Germany. Every step we take in that direction "brings grist to their mill."

The gentleman from New York says to us that the people in Germany are restive under their present enthrallment and would throw off the bondage of monometallism. In the Reichstag the vote recently taken stood 145 to 118 in favor of bimetallism. Mr. Goshen, from Scotland, in the English Parliament has changed front and says: "'Tis now a question of bimetallism or starvation among the masses." But lo! now a statesman in the American Congress would change all this present hopeful struggle for bimetallism in Europe by proclaiming to these struggling millions that after all they are mistaken! In the free Republic, where the people rule, they, too, have to admit that "silver must go." And so plutocracy secures another precedent!

Now, let me return to the effect of silver money upon labor. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] first conjures depreciated money, and then proceeds to demonstrate that the laborer is to work on and on through all the years of depreciated money for practically the same wages. Does not every child know that the price of labor is the most movable thing we buy or sell? But now look on the other picture a moment. Let us inquire about the rich man whom the gentleman goes out of the way to tell us "needs no sympathy and should have none." Methinks the gentleman "doth protest too much" against the rich man. He wants only gold for money; he is for unimetallism, except he would tolerate silver for subsidiary coin, to be a sort of "tender to gold" instead of a legal tender to pay debts. What does that mean? It means, sir, practically the annihilation of more than one-third of our debt-paying material. Yea; it means more. It means to force us into a constantly narrowing alley, where we can use only a metal that is on the decline. To-day the annual production of gold does not exceed $93,000,000 in the world, and it is certain that in the arts more than $75,000,000 is absorbed.

"The rich man needs no sympathy," protests the gentleman, and then proceeds, in behalf of the poor man, to develop his plan for avoiding a depreciated currency, which includes a scheme for doubling all indebtedness in behalf of the rich man! The poor man needs all our sympathy, says the gentleman, and thus having placed himself solid with the wage-workers, he unfolds his plan to double the toil necessary to pay a nation's debt or lift a mortgage from a home!

THE CRY AGAINST PRODUCERS OF SILVER.

There are small-souled men who think the bimetallists are fighting this battle all in aid of the producers of silver. Now, sir, while I think it would be entirely defensible, if it could be done without injury, to coin silver in the interest of American product, I venture to say that not one man in a thousand advocates the use of silver as money with the view only of assisting the producers of silver. I do not deny that the producers of silver have had that in contemplation, and being interested in that direction have thoroughly investigated the utility of that metal for money. But to say that protection to silver producers is the moving cause that has grown into an overwhelming demand for the continuance of silver coinage is, I submit, simply absurd. I am glad to know that the cry is now confined nearly within the limits of the weak-minded and the venal. Being narrow and avaricious themselves they suppose no one can have a higher motive than that which prompts their own action. God pity such shriveled souls!

For myself, I will say that I am for protecting all home industry by law, wherever and whenever such protection will furnish labor for my countrymen, unless by so doing greater evil than good will come of it, which I confidently assert can very seldom occur. Prove to me that silver is not necessary for money and that ends my interest in it so far as the legislation we are now discussing is concerned. To buy silver or to ordain its free coinage is not and can not be defended for an hour on the score of protection. But if the using of silver as money is a double blessing, blessed alike in its production and its use, then I say that every man who loves his country and his countrymen should alike rejoice. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] in this regard falls into belaboring his political associates because by advocating silver for money they incidentally encourage its production and then taunts them because they are are not loyal to their free-trade theories. Does it occur to the gentleman that if they are disloyal to free trade in consequence of their adherence to the silver dollar that he as a protectionist is disloyal to protection for abandoning the silver dollar? When that stone was flung out, I suspect my friend forgot that he was in a glass house.

THE FIRE TEST.

Knowing how the American citizen despises anything that has even the appearance of repudiation, and still intent on demonstrating that the 412½ grains of silver is not an honest dollar, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] comes into court, not with sharpened knife and a pair of scales, as did Antonio's persecutor, but with a melting-pot in each hand—one for gold and one for silver. The gold and silver being melted, what have we? Nothing new, sir. It is only bullion. The gold has still its "law" advantage over silver, and for that reason is worth more. All the laws ordained in its behalf still stand. None that have been taken from silver spring into being, and so the melting-pots prove nothing after all to the detriment of silver. The uses for gold are not lessened by fire, nor are the uses of silver multiplied thereby. Discrimination remains, and gold is worth more than silver—not because of the fire, but because of the law that the fire can not burn. As money it has no more law than gold, and yet it does all that gold can do as money. As bullion it has less law—much less—and for that reason it falls behind. The fire test has only proved what you did not want to prove, namely, that when the laws which alike uphold apply they are equal, but when reduced by fire so that the unequal laws become operative, that which is by law upheld stands and that which is not upheld by law falls to a point that just measures the strength of the law.

Let the gentleman take hence his melting-pots; they prove too much. He has established only fiat in his gold bullion. It is the gentleman's own car, and not his neighbor's, that is moving. Visual deception is his malady. It comes from being up in a gilded balloon, sir. While he sits serenely he is mounting into heights dangerous. But, like the man and the lamp-post, all oblivious of his own movements, he swears that "'tis the great globe that's moving." He knows, as well he may, that there is danger, but it will come, not from the earth's receding, as he assumes, but by too high riding. The gentleman evidently believes the bottom is dropping from the universe, when it is evident the gold men are trying to kick off the cover. Open that safety-valve a little. Come down, sir, from your giddy heights and things will be to you, once again, what they seem.

The gentleman goes out of his way to hunt for some economic law to apply to silver that he would not apply to gold. After declaring that the poor man is likely to get all the poor money, and there being now no poor money, he proceeds to display his subsidiary-coin system by which the poor man may be furnished some poor money. He says: "Subsidiary coin need not necessarily represent an intrinsic metallic value."

Of all the theories yet advanced, no one, until we were treated to the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has had the temerity to recommend a money that "need not necessarily represent intrinsic worth." Let it be remembered that this position was reached after he had told us to "protect in God's name the poor man." When he comes to the consideration of the effect of continued coinage upon money loaning he gets of course on the lender's side of the counter. "If," says he, "I have to-day $10,000 of silver, which is on a parity with $10,000 of gold, however anxious I may be to loan it, * * * I will not loan it if there is any uncertainty as to whether I am to receive in return when due anything less than its value when I parted from it."

Still up in his gilded balloon you see! Suppose for a minute he should get down among the borrowers for whom he professes so much sympathy, and, presuming that they have some little option left, what will they tell him? Will they not say to the lender "If I am to pay you at the maturity of the note I am to give in a thing worth more than that I get, I think I will not take your money?" You see, sir, the gentleman only sees one side, and that the upper side. To his thinking, evidently, there is option nowhere excepting in the payee. Again, he attributes the dearth of money-lending and of business to want of confidence in the lender, and forgets, of course, that want of confidence in the borrower may break off a bargain or prevent the building of an iron-furnace or a rolling-mill.

Again, he says "the capital of the country is idle because the people owning it realize the uncertainty of the future," &c. Let me remind the gentleman that the capital is idle not only because those owning it are troubled with uncertainties, but because those who would like to borrow and use it are troubled with uncertainties also. The warfare against silver has frightened both borrower and lender; one because he fears silver bullion is to decline, and the other because he fears gold bullion is to advance.

DISCRETION IN THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

To close with the gentleman offers a proposition "to give the people all the silver money they want!" He starts out, however, by repealing the act which gives them what they now have and then provides that after the Treasurer fails to have on hand $20,000,000, which he calls a "silver coinage-adjustment fund," then he may coin enough to restore said fund. This is a very taking scheme. According to his views, the people already have too much of silver, and in order to prove it he would offer them more. Surely everybody should be satisfied with this! Indeed some of the silver advocates have been so credulous as to think that they have discovered something like a purpose to be just to silver in this plan. The proposition is delusive to the last degree.

Mr. BAYNE. Why, it compels the Secretary to keep $20,000,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says it compels him to keep twenty millions in the Treasury. He has succeeded in keeping eighty-seven millions there, when every dollar of it should have been out; and the gentleman well knows it. He might have paid out out every dollar of it for silver bullion.

Why, sir, whether the people have or have not silver money enough now is one of the matters in dispute. The gold men say we have too much, the silver men say we have too little. The Secretary of the Treasury seems from the beginning to have taken sides with the former. He has only coined to the minimum of his discretion. The people, to whom the gentleman proposes by his bill "to submit this whole question," have been demanding more silver, but all in vain. The Treasurer clings to his policy of coining two millions worth when he might have coined four millions worth. We have, you see, sir, only to refer to the past eight years to prove that the people's wishes are of no account. But if we had had no experience, the proposition is meaningless when put to the test. How, I ask, are we to know whether the people want more silver or not? Is it expected by the gentleman that they will come in droves from the prairies and the mountains to demand silver money to the exclusion of other money? Or would he be content with petitions? If so, then he has but to consult the records and he will find a very decided demand for more silver.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his response to the House resolution from the Committee on Coinage makes it clear that he is utterly opposed to the further coinage of silver. He believes Congress should stop its coinage. If Congress should give him the discretion to do so, think you he would not exercise it? To say he would not is to assume that his professions are not his convictions. If I have not a very mistaken idea of the ability of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, should we give him this "silver-coinage-adjustment" machinery, he will take care that further coinage of silver shall fall into "innocuous desuetude." [Laughter.]

There is no law to compel the Treasurer to pay out gold for silver bullion (see letter of the Secretary in append); but it will be seen he is following a custom (which would be "much more honored in the breach than in the observance"), and thereby makes it appear that the coinage of silver is but swapping good money for poor.(?) All this matter of transportation of silver, to the great expense of the Government and the people, which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] makes out so burdensome, could be avoided by sending a certificate of a gram's weight and at the cost of a 2-cent postage stamp! But if such a policy were pursued you see, sir, the people could not understand why coinage should be suspended! It is plain that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] can safely trust his "silver-coinage-adjustment" plan with our present Secretary of the Treasury. Understand me, I am not reflecting upon the honesty or honor of the Secretary. It is his policy to use gold; he frankly admits it. It is his way of maintaining the credit of the Government. His construction of that portion of the act of '73, still in force, making gold the unit, induces him to the conclusion that all the nation's creditors are entitled to gold.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

But I want to talk a little about the trade-dollar.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], to the astonishment of all friends of silver, fell into berating the trade-dollar. It was an unfortunate reference. The trade-dollar illustrates nothing that assists his side of the case; on the contrary, it forcibly points to the effect of laws that discriminate in behalf of gold. Once that trade-dollar had equal law with gold. Then it was equal to gold in all that money can do in the world of commerce. It lost its proper status by the same process now sought to be applied to the standard dollar. Congress robbed the trade-dollar of its legal-tender quality, and now Congressmen lift it in our presence in disparaging contrast wtih the gold dollar. This is like holding up the bloody hands of murder to prove to the jury that the hands are guiltless, and that the crime rests in the blood that crimsons them.

THE LEGAL UNION OF THE TWO METALS A NECESSITY.

Nicholas Veeder, of Pittsburgh, Pa., in a well-written pamphlet, has presented a plan to secure stability in money. He proposes to unite the metals in a single coin, with silver as the outer rim and gold in the center. It is easy to see that stability would be secured and maintained by this plan, for as silver rises gold falls, or as gold rises silver falls, but the same intrinsic value is still maintained in the coin. The objection to the plan is probably its impracticability. It nevertheless serves to illustrate a point, and that point is that use should be maintained as either of the metals, for any cause, declines or advances. But Mr. Veeder's plan would do no more to maintain stability in value than can be accomplished by a legal union.

The law may direct plans that shall be just as effective in continuing the use of either metal as if they were joined in a compound coin. Just as when there is a considerable failure of the wheat crop corn may be used to such an extent as actually to lower the price of wheat, notwithstanding its scarcity, or vice versa. The rule is just as good whether corn and wheat are mixed and ground together for use or whether they be used separately. The same laws will apply to the material from which money is coined. It can not be said that the interposition of artificial laws will change the operation of the laws of supply and demand; for if they are equitably applied, and alike to both metals, the natural laws will have full operation upon both—that is to say, if the coin of both alike are endowed by the nation with the legal-tender quality, if free coinage is applied to both and based upon the same conditions and restrictions, then the bullion price of the metals will be as self-adjusting under the operation of natural laws as any other commodity that ministers to man's necessities.

STABILITY.

The constant cry against a double standard by gentlemen on the other side is that it is unstable. The very converse is true. Let wheat and corn illustrate again. Whenever there is a scarcity of wheat, if there be plenty of corn, the latter serves as a conservator on the price of the former. Corn enters more largely into consumption and lessens the demand for wheat, and there is a constant adjustment—an automatic maintenance of parity. Precisely so it is with the metals—the high price of gold brings silver into greater use, if not interfered with by legislation; and that enlarged use of silver relieves the demand for gold and lowers its value. The rule would hold good if the production of gold should increase so as to depreciate its value. That very depreciation would increase its use until taking the place of silver the latter would on account of its temporary idleness decline to a parity with gold. With gold only as the measure of values (or silver either) the chances of fluctuation are many times greater. Scarcity of the single metal would be certain to derange prices of all commodities. It seems a part of the economy of natural laws that whatever man needs for his sustenance is given him in duplication in something that will help in the season of scarcity or abundance, to regulate, adjust, and render stable the price he must pay for his necessities.

OUR RESOURCES.

Nature with lavish hand has given us a wealth of resource found nowhere else on the globe. Gold and silver have we in our mountains. They beckon us to come and mine and pay our debts and buy our homes and "plant our own vine and fig tree." From boyhood till now I could never comprehend why so many of my countrymen cling forever to British precedent. More than fifty years ago Jackson said: "It is time we became a little more Americanized." To my thinking nothing so stays our progress as lack of independence. Why break England's chains and forever wear them? Why shed blood to throw off her laws and customs and still submit forever to be their slave? I want no wealth, no glory, no power acquired like that of England. The gentleman from South Carolina thinks it would be a "worthy ambition" to build after English architecture. I rejoice that my country has never failed to achieve wealth and honor surpassing that of England—save only when she has followed English example. There is not a people under the sun whose acquisitions are the product of wrong and robbery to the extent of England. Take from England what she has extorted from the victims of her oppression, and she would be as poor as Lazarus.

The gentleman talks about "England's well-paid labor." Where? Paid by whom? Only, sir, upon the little island of Great Britain, and there not so well paid as ours, and there paid by tribute wrung from her subjects wherever her drum-beat is heard around the world. Paid by whom? By Ireland, down-trodden, wronged, oppressed, and outraged by centuries of unparalleled brutality. [Applause.] Paid by whom? By India, debauched and manacled by the intrigues of a soulless corporation. Paid by whom? By far-off Egypt, despoiled of her ancestral succession and led captive through a sea of blood to the feet of the conqueror. Paid by whom? By the American colonies in the days of their forced dependence; yea, and in the vigor and strength of their manhood, whenever the cunning Briton could find dupes and dudes enough in this country to permit him to foist upon us his free-trade schemes to cheat our labor and capture our cash. Paid by whom? By this nation, sir, when, alas for her glory, our home-consecrated prairies were permitted to fall captive to strangers and aliens from that very nation that first demonetized silver and demoralized the moneys of the world.

Not all the Chinamen that ever crossed the seas so menace our labor or so assail our free institutions as the British syndicates that now defile our great domain in the land of the setting sun, to the extent of more than 25,000,000 acres.

Across the spell of a century now gone I hear a voice that has no echo in our modern democratic utterance. It charges King George III with having "plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burned our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people, * * * and that, too, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous age." If any appointee of the present administration shall undertake to erase this inscription, written in the temple of fame by hands immortal, I shall appeal to my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] to institute an investigation that will hunt the vandal down and shoot him on the spot. [Laughter.]

I commend to the gentleman from South Carolina the reading of Thomas Jefferson's version of how "England achieved her most enviable position." Sir, I have no sympathy with the cant of our time that attributes all wisdom and all achievement to the "breed of noble blood" beyond the seas. I believe in an Americanism that has the independence to utilize every resource God has bestowed upon us, without asking whether it please an Iron chancellor or an iron despot; and I believe in a devotion to American citizenship that will stand for his broadest rights, his amplest liberty, though all the precedents that man in his whole career has molded into maxims, be dead against us.

For one thing I have always admired England: She will defend her citizenship from every wrong other nations may inflict, no matter how powerful that other nation may be. Would to God our present Secretary of State could be induced to imitate England in this respect. So far from it, the last English outrage upon American citizenship was "redressed" by the victim being told, with many honeyed words, "to go into the English courts for vindication!"

Oh, for a stroke of the magic pen of that great Secretary who was deposed by an assassin's bullet!

I plead for the makers and builders of our present heritage—the toiling men and women of America. To meet our obligations, to maintain our credit, to preserve unsullied our honor, to build up our waste places, and to mold for us a future as glorious as our past, they stand with eager hands and willing hearts ready to go forth conquerors in every highway of human achievement.

These are not "uneasy captives in the world of which they are the conquerors," as has been suggested. They are the host triumphant, coming from North and South and East and West, "bringing their sheaves with them."

Woe unto the Congress that shall reject the offerings they bring! Woe unto the legislator who shall say unto one of the least of these: "The sacrifice ye offer shall not be imputed unto you for righteousness." [Great applause.]

APPENDIX.

THE SILVER QUESTION—REPRESENTATIVE BROWN DEFINES HIS POSITION IN RELATION TO IT.

To the Editor of the Agitator:

In an article appearing in the Agitator of the 2d instant under the head of "How to make cheap money," you have seen fit to assail my position on the silver question as interpreted by a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press.

* * * * * * *

I have introduced a bill authorizing free coinage and certification of silver mined in this country—just as gold is coined and certified. Between gold and silver I make no distinction, except that I would coin or certify all gold and I would coin or certify all silver produced in this country. The limitation of the coinage and certification of silver to the product of our own country I believe to be only a present necessity induced by the war of the creditor nations against it. In a very brief period the Old World, seeing the blessings that the utilization of our own resources brings to us, and in order to prevent the emigration and bankruptcy of their subjects, will remonetize silver, and then we will be relieved of the necessity of such legislation as now seems to be needed in order to meet the present abnormal condition of things. But I would not even do this without providing for new uses for silver, so that instead of making cheap money, as you assume, I would increase its value every hour, until, by the depreciation of gold and the appreciation of silver, the metals would reach a common point. For, be it said, I believe—and I think I can demonstrate it—that the appreciation of gold has separated these brother metals quite as much as the depreciation of silver. This has been brought about by the decrease of silver uses and the consequent increase of gold uses. Now, can we restore their equilibrium? I think so. We are happily situated in the most advantageous position possible to increase the uses of silver. This comes from our very needs. We have the best banking system in the world. As the system is now organized it must die or we must perpetuate our national debt. There is no other alternative. Do we desire the latter? I do not. I know of men who do.

Is this to cheapen the value of the 412½ grains of silver in a dollar? I believe it to be the very reverse. To this plan objection has been made that it gives national banks too good an opportunity to buy cheap bullion. What of it? Would not their speculation advance the price of bullion? Would not the new demand, with but little change in the supply, as certainly advance silver as that water seeks the level? So it seems to me.

It is idle to say that the Old World would dump her silver upon us and keep the supply equal to the new demand, for I would prevent all that danger by the levying of whatever duty might be necessary to drive back this as I would any commodity that embarrasses our protective policy. Assuming that the plan has only a chance for success, should we not try it?

It is not a matter of convenience. That question may all be eliminated by having the certificate perform the functions of the dollar itself. Neither silver nor gold is convenient to carry for money, but should not their representatives which are alike convenient be used alike? This is the question. The year 1886 must, in my opinion, determine whether "silver must go." Demonetize it now, and never, until we have traveled through the valley and shadow of panic and the poverty that inevitably follows, will this elder brother of gold have a name and a place in the money of the world. Because England has demonetized silver shall we? She is a creditor nation. The world owes her more than $3,000,000,000! Why should she not destroy silver and thereby double the value of the thing she is to receive for her loans? Germany is a creditor nation; the world owes her more than $2,000,000,000; why should she not dethrone silver for a like reason? But why should America do this? "Oh," it is said, "gold will retreat, it will go hence, the world will dump upon us her silver; the world get our gold!" So says theory, but practice denies it. Gold has increased from a little over two hundred million to more than six hundred million since silver was remonetized. I do not attempt to controvert the theory; but shall we desert our guns even before the enemy which a theory has conjured assails us? Alexander Hamilton, the greatest financier this Republic, if not the world, has produced, in his masterly report to Congress in 1791, qualified this seemingly infallible theory, and ninety-five years of experience has established the wisdom of his qualifications. Whether the cheaper metal, said he, drives out the dearer depends upon the existence of countervailing cause or law. It requires but slight resistance to repel the tendency. Such countervailing laws or causes have evidently been operating during the last eight years in our behalf, and they seem more potential to-day than ever.

Hamilton does not enumerate the countervailing laws to which he refers, and for the reason, probably, that they are varying and may not always exist. That they do exist in our behalf is absolutely certain. The export of silver is much greater than its import; the export of gold is much less than its import. This is incontrovertible proof that the tendency of the dearer metal to retreat is overcome. While there may be, doubtless there are, many causes operating in our behalf, I need mention but one, and that the fact that the silver dollar pays and purchases just as much as the gold dollar. Can one drive out the other when their capacity to do are equal? Have not the prophets of evil miscalculated, because they ignored more causes than they considered?

As between gold and the diamond, the former can not even stand the ratio of 16 to 1 of the latter; therefore, we will take our stand by the diamond and, looking down upon gold, we will ask, Why not monetize steel and marble and pot-metal? You answer, perhaps, "Oh, but the diamond is not money." Very well, but has it not value above gold; and is not value all that gold has above silver? Or, to put it still more direct, has not silver every money quality that gold has, except equal value with it? And, if so, have not gold and silver escaped from the degradation of a parallel with pot-metal by precisely the same road? Neither glitter equal to the diamond, but both have come down to us bearing alike the proofs of forty centuries' experience that they are each God's gifts to man for his money! Suppose a proposition were made to take from the gold dollar enough grains to bring it down to the price of silver bullion, would that be fair to the creditor? I think you would answer no. Is it any less fair to the people—the Government—who must pay the great debt, that they should be required to add to the number of grains of the silver dollar until it reaches the appreciated price of gold? But this is not the whole of the demand now being made. Its command is, You shall not use your silver at all to meet your indebtedness, and you must change the contract so it shall read: "This obligation must be paid in gold, principal and interest."

Heretofore our Government, without loss to her credit and at great advantage to her people, has stood in the breach (except from 1873 to 1878), and by her legislation maintained—in spite of her financial ministers—the ability of the silver dollar to pay as much debt and buy as much bread as gold. Shall we abandon this half of our money now, while yet the "stars in their courses" fight our battles for us? Has Germany grown richer by her demonetization of silver? Are not her poor fleeing from the Fatherland as from a famine? Look at the statistics of immigration to our shores for the answer. If it were unwisdom in her would it not be madness in us? It is said that France has recently ceased the coinage of silver, but was not that after she had coined near three times as much as our present volume? And is it yet certain that she was wise in her last conclusion? She was frightened into the belief that she would lose her gold. Were her fears well grounded? Near eight hundred millions of the yellow metal remains with her to-day, and is she not the most prosperous nation in Europe?

I write this letter with the view of eliciting discussion. Too little discussion before is likely to bring a great deal of discussion after the voting. I have no pet theories of my own. I only ask questions, answering them when I can, and when I can not I seek for wisdom wherever I may find it, greatly desiring to do my whole duty to the people, debtor and creditor alike, in the confident belief always that what is best for one is best for both in the long run. The present law does not suit me, for it appears to discriminate in behalf of silver; but is it not more in the seeming than in fact? True, the Government buys silver, but not for the vender's benefit so much as for herself. She makes the profit there is between the price of bullion and the dollar she coins, and in so doing she does what her contract entitles her to do. I do not think this the correct plan, but can we afford to abandon it until a better one is offered that preserves to us our silver money? After all, is it not better that silver should have an open field with gold? They have traveled a long journey together; if divided, can either carry the world's commerce alone?

Very truly, yours,

W. W. BROWN.

JANUARY 10, 1886.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 8, 1886.

Mr. WILLIAM W. BROWN introduced the following bill:

A bill relating to the coinage of silver dollars and the issuing of silver certificates thereon and upon silver bullion, and providing for the depositing of the same as security for the circulating notes of national banks.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the device and superscriptions provided by said act, which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for all debts and dues, public and private, except when otherwise provided by contract; and any person who is or may be the owner of silver bullion produced and mined within the United States, but not elsewhere, may deposit the same at any United States coinage mint or assay office, to be coined into silver dollars for his benefit, upon the same terms and conditions as gold bullion is deposited for coinage under existing laws.

SEC. 2. That any holder of the coin authorized by this act, or the holder of any coined silver known as the "trade-dollar," may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $10, and the said Treasurer shall deliver in exchange therefor silver certificates, in sums of one, two, five, and ten dollars, or any multiple thereof corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes; and the coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment or redemption of the same on demand: Provided, That the "trade-dollar" received by said United States Treasurer shall, before using the same for the redemption of any silver certificates, be recoined into standard silver dollars of the same weight and fineness provided in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That at the option of the owner of any silver bullion produced and mined within the United States, but not elsewhere, he may deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States, in quantities not less than 100 ounces troy weight, and receive in exchange therefor, at the rate of $1 for every 412½ grains standard silver, silver certificates, in sums not less than $10 each, and any multiple thereof corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes; and the bullion deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment or redemption of the same on demand. And the said silver certificates authorized by the second and third sections of this act shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, to the same extent and for the same purposes that gold certificates are a legal tender under existing laws.

SEC. 4. That the silver bullion deposited under this act shall be received, subject to all the provisions of law as to assaying, melting, and refining when below standard, casting into ingots or bars, the same as if deposited for coinage.

SEC. 5. That when any of the certificates herein authorized are redeemed in silver dollars or silver bullion, they shall be canceled and destroyed; but certificates which come back into the Treasury by or through other ways or payments shall not be canceled, but shall be held as cash, and may be reissued or paid out again.

SEC. 6. That whenever any banking association organized or being organized under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, known as the "national-bank act," shall desire so to do, it may, instead of transferring and delivering to the Treasurer of the United States bonds of the United States, as now provided by sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes, deliver and transfer in lieu thereof to said Treasurer gold and silver bullion at the rate of 25.8 grains standard gold for $1, and 412½ grains of standard silver for $1, and in exchange therefor the Comptroller of the Currency shall deliver to said banking association circulating notes at the rates of $1 for every 25.8 grains of standard gold, and $1 for every 412½ grains of standard silver, to the same extent and percentage on the amount in dollars deposited, and upon the same terms and conditions (except no interest shall be paid upon the bullion deposited) as circulating notes are now delivered to banking associations under sections 5171 and 5172 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 7. That at the option of any such banking association, it may deposit gold or silver certificates, at their nominal value, with the Treasurer of the United States, for the same purposes, and may secure therefor circulating notes upon the same terms and conditions as if gold or silver bullion were deposited under the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 8. That whenever any bonds held by any existing national banking association shall hereafter be called in for payment by the Government, said banking association may continue or renew its security with the Treasurer of the United States for its circulating notes by the deposit with the said Treasurer of gold or silver bullion, or gold or silver certificates, in like manner and upon the same terms provided in the sixth and seventh sections of this act: Provided always, That no other silver shall be offered by such banking associations, or received by the Treasurer of the United States, for the purposes aforesaid, other than such as is mined within the United States.

SEC. 9. That the act of February 28, 1878, providing for the coinage of silver dollars, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith, are hereby repealed.

ELMIRA, N. Y., March 19, 1886.

MY DEAR FRIEND: As something of an enthusiast in the study of political economy, and economic questions arising in our country, I am interested in the "silver question."

I make bold to trespass upon your good-will and friendship, and ask you to send or cause to be sent to me the "cream" of the discussion in Congress.

I shall be especially interested whenever the question is discussed from the standpoint following, namely: Has silver depreciated, or has gold appreciated?

If the silver dollar, reckoned at its market value as a commodity, as distinguished from its monetary value, will buy as much, or substantially as much, of the necessaries and comforts of life, taking a list say of forty articles, as the gold dollar would when the silver dollar was authorized, it follows inevitably that the gold dollar has appreciated; the silver is the honest and gold the dishonest dollar.

This can be answered only by a comparison of prices.

My own investigations, begun as a monometallist, are driving me to bimetallism and the conviction that the silver dollar is the honest one of to-day.

SEYMOUR DEXTER.

Hon. W. W. BROWN,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 31st ultimo, in reference to payments for silver bullion, and, in reply, beg to advise you that such payments are made by checks in favor of the sellers, drawn by the United States assayers and superintendents of mints, against funds placed to their credit with the assistant treasurer of the United States in New York. I have also to say that such checks are paid in the same manner as other checks are paid, through the clearing-house.

There is no law prescribing the kind of money in which payments for silver bullion shall be made.

Very respectfully,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. W. W. BROWN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The following table shows the average prices of twenty-one articles and necessaries, from the year 1873, when the real war commenced against silver, to and including 1885. It will be seen by this table that the bullion in a silver dollar to-day will buy more of these articles than the bullion in 1873—whether gold or silver. It shows conclusively the appreciation of gold bullion, and negatives every assumption of depreciation in silver.

Yearly cost of supplies of a family of four persons at the lowest point.

Mr. FINDLAY. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] any time remaining?

The SPEAKER. Two and a half minutes of his time remain.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I had agreed to yield, if I had time remaining, five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and five to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will yield the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], as I have not enough time to discuss the proposition I had intended to advert to.

Mr. FINDLAY addressed the House. When he had spoken for the time yielded to him the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINDLAY. I will extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman from Maryland please mention, that the RECORD may show it, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] was not in the House when he made his remarks.

Mr. FINDLAY. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] was here a short time ago. I will say to the gentleman that I shall not only publish that in the RECORD, but much more. I shall satisfy the gentleman from Georgia entirely on that point. I have leave to print under the general leave, and shall avail myself of that.

Mr. FINDLEY'S remarks, in full, are as follows:

Mr. Speaker, some two months since I was audacious enough to present some simple views upon the question now vexing the House and the country, all unconscious that my innocent although erring feet were standing upon an unexploded mine in the bosom of the gentleman from Georgia. If I did not fully realize the terrors of the situation it must be remembered in extenuation of my temerity that that gentleman had not then given us any earnest, however slight, of what, as Bob Acres tells his friend Jack, a devil of a fellow he was.

If I had known what delicate and refined humor, what penetrating wit, what power of extemporaneous speech, was then gathering in a black cloud, to break over my devoted head, after sixty days of painful suspense, in manuscript, is it necessary for me to say that I would have taken more than usual pains to dodge the plantation thunderbolts of this Jupiter Tonans, forged in the smithy of Simon Suggs? I trust, therefore, that the gentleman from Georgia and that this House will excuse the seeming rash indiscretion with which I plunged into this heavy debate, for, on my honor, gentlemen, I did not realize and could not conceive any evolutionary process, however extraordinary, to the extent even of evolving a Stuart Mill out of Georgia Scenes, by which my innocent figure of the combined metals could have been converted into the similitude of Her Majesty's lion; still less that the statesman from Georgia, on a dry, economical subject like this should have fallen to twisting the British lion's tail to the point of mutilation. It seemed to me that there were enough twists already in this knotty subject to spare us from an additional complication with the royal beast, the relation of which to the comparative merits of gold and silver as a standard of value, although profusely illustrated with all the tropes of an exuberant logic, and cut clean and sharp with the cold and calculating chisel of a severe imagination, the gentleman from Georgia did not quite succeed in making apparent. I know that tail whether in motion or at rest is a great provocative of wrath. The city fathers of Baltimore gave us four lions in stone as ornaments to one of the bridges over that classic stream known as Jones's Falls across which the gentleman might whisper until he was out of breath and never so much as a single responsive echo come back. These animals were of sturdy proportion and faultless form, modeled in exquisite lines of grace and beauty which the artist could only have caught from that vivid picture of Hogg's metempsychosis in the Noctes. My friend is familiar with Scotland, and carries Ben Lomond on his shoulders with the ease of an Atlas. He is doubtless also familiar with her literature, and will readily recall the wonderful description of North to which I refer, a description which caused the Ettrick Shepherd to exclaim, "That Wulson is a droll bitch and as wonderfu' as droll." Each of these lions so modeled was provided with a gentle drooping tail curving upward like a pump handle. They were the pride of the city until, it is said, Larry Finnegan happened that way one night as the wolf came down upon the fold, and when the morning broke the lions were not only in extremis, but their extremities had passed away as a tale that is told. Conceiving that they were British lions, although the mayor pathetically protested that they were not lions at all, but some other heraldic beast of unknown lineage and short-lived fame, Larry took each mother's son of them by the tail, and there in the deep waist and middle of the night, to the music of the shooting stars and the liquid lapse of Jones's murmuring fall, registering a patriotic oath in high heaven that tails may wag as they will but no tail should wag over him, although stiff in stone, twisted the offending member completely off and left not so much as a stump behind.

I know of no parallel to this sturdy devotion, this unthinking, spontaneous, mad loyalty to tradition and principle which mistakes a griffin for a lion and then falls to twisting his tail to the point of absolute fracture, except the infatuation of the gentleman from Georgia, who, like the man who could only tell Daniel in the lion's den from the lions themselves by the blue cotton umbrella he carried under his arm, can not distinguish an innocent allusion to that prophet's works and the image he describes from that terrible beast whose four paws rest upon the four continents, and whose restless extremity lashes the horizon of the universe. He is worse than the witches who pursued Tam and poor Maggie over the brig where the "Doon pours all her floods."

> Ae spring brought off her master hale,
> But left behind her ain gray tail—

Why, a man with such a confusion of ideas and with such a propensity for twisting facts is scarcely safe. He will twist anything. If he was mounted on the rich man's horse or the poor man's mule in the tandem which he has so elegantly described he would in all probability mistake them for England's royal beast, with the usual consequence, upon his perfervid imagination. It is pleasant, however, to remember the probable effect upon the mule, and the promising prospect of a requiescat in pace thereafter for somebody. The gentleman from Georgia has attempted to ridicule all other theories but his own in the dangerous attempt to play the rôle of the funny man on the heels of quite a successful effort some time ago, forgetting that the subject and the circumstances are quite different, and that if there is any one kind of speech more than another which a man had better be content to rest on his laurels it is a funny speech. Humor is one thing, and sarcasm, thinly veiling an assumed superiority, behind which its author covertly depreciates the efforts of others, is quite a different performance. The man who resorts to it should be sure of his weapon, for it is one that may be made as dangerous in the hands of his enemy as his own.

The gentleman has undertaken with great deliberation to make me a target for what he doubtless considers some very crushing allusions, as he has taken the trouble to commit them to paper, and waited for two months to throw them off in that happy extempore style which distinguishes the spontaneous efforts of eloquence in this body. He seems to think that I was guilty of a contradiction in advocating the gold standard, because I admitted that the business of the country was carried on in great part by a secondary or fiduciary currency. His inference from this admission was that neither gold nor silver was necessary, and that I must fall into line with my friend General WEAVER. This contradictory position he illustrated, if I remember, by a reference to some predatory chickens, as he termed them, whose forward movement was prevented by some ingenious mechanism which turned their heads backward. I am not surprised at the gentleman mistaking my meaning, or that this predatory chicken should find her face always turning backward, for that, I believe, is the region of the tail, a favorite spot with the gentleman. He was so bent on framing his new declaration of independence and rousing the yeomanry of the country against British gold, that he had no time to note an inconsiderable point like this, that while the business of the country is carried on by a representative currency, and in fact in great part by commercial paper, there was nothing inconsistent in this fact with the most rigid demand that behind this currency and paper there should be up to the credit point a volume of specie as nearly stable and fixed in value as the ingenuity of man could devise, and that that specie in my opinion was gold. The greenback upon its face and apart from judicial construction is an honest piece of paper. It professes to be exactly what it is—a promise to pay a dollar, and not a dollar. The dollar with which it is to be redeemed, in my opinion, ought to be a dollar whose bullion value will not be in a state of perpetual flux. That dollar, I believe, if made of gold, will furnish the most stable redemption fund. It, of course, may be made of silver by an additional weight or number of grains, but the coined piece would be unwieldy, and besides there would still be the uncertainty as to the stability of the value.

The gentleman from Georgia, after ridiculing all the remedies suggested by others as the quack formulas of the Sangrados, a very original figure by the way, comes to state his own panacea. I had supposed from the way he started out that he had no views upon the subject; but it seems he had, and to surprise us, like the fellow with good news, kept the best for the last. He says: "Doctor FINDLAY, your remedy will not do; Doctor WARNER, your safe kidney cure has gone into innocuous desuetude; Doctor BROWN, your iron bitters are a failure; all stand aside. I am the great original medicine-man, a born Hippocrates, and I, of all men living, know what is the matter with this patient." The country is rich and prosperous, contented and happy. There are no strikes in the West; no labor troubles anywhere. Furnaces are in full blast, especially in Pennsylvania; all the spindles and looms are running on full time, more particularly throughout New England; all property has appreciated. What think you of your ally, your Jefferson, about to proclaim a new declaration of independence, with his yeomanry at his back; what think you of him? Doctor WARNER, when he says that property is higher, real as well as personal and mixed—when, if I understand your contention, everything is dirt cheap because of the scarcity of money, and for that reason you cry for more—why that is the reason why I thought the Goddess of Liberty, described somewhere in the gentleman's speech like Casabianca on the burning deck, "was drinking deep potations of the people's blood." One thing certain is, there never was a time in the history of this country when everything that man consumes was so cheap. It may be hard to get, for when things are cheap money is not freely circulating. Give us more money, say the silver men, and all property will be higher. But our Hippocrates says property is high now, higher than it was between 1873 and 1878, when there was no standard dollar of full legal-tender value. The inference would seem to be from this that if we abolish this dollar altogether the prices of all things would immediately appreciate.

But I am interrupting the diagnosis. I forget that we are all waiting to hear the great man's opinion. He is called in, or he called himself in, as consulting physician-in-chief, and he is ready to announce his conclusion. He is going to do it with great gravity. It becomes the doctor to be slow and deliberate, and this is a characteristic of all this doctor's utterances. He is so grave that, as Lamb has it on one of the old South Sea benchers, you might deduce the law of gravitation from his presence. What, then, Doctor NORWOOD, is the matter with this patient? Nothing, absolutely nothing; he is not a sick man at all; he is in his normal condition, and in fact was never better in his life. But consider, doctor, this symptom and the other. But the inflexible old Solon shakes his head, and assures the astounded friends and family that the patient is entirely well.

My friend is familiar with Dickens. He quotes from Dombey and Son. I will not refer him, therefore, to Bunsby, but will tell him a little story I once heard. It applies to the buzzard, and has some fitness, therefore, in a discussion in which that singular bird has been more than once introduced. I suppose the gentleman from Georgia, who seems to be familiar with the evolution by which the eagle is changed into the buzzard, must know something of its habits, and has not failed to observe the even steadiness with which this bird will circle for hours, sweeping the whole horizon, with scarcely a perceptible dip of the wing or the disturbance of a feather.

It has puzzled a great many persons how a bird as heavy could keep himself poised in the air upon his balanced wings and yet move all the time without apparent effort, a free circulation by the way in which he is not imitated by his silver brother. I remember that the puzzle perplexed all the neighborhood in which I once lived, until a workman on the place said that his preacher knew everything, and that he would refer the question to him and be sure of an answer. So the question was referred at the next meeting, and Pat returned triumphantly with his answer. "I knew," said he, "that Brother Jones could tell how this was done, and what's more he was no time telling it." "Well, what did he say?" "He said it was the custom of the bird!"

"Silver," says my learned friend, "has no more influence upon the causes of trouble in this country"—from which it would appear that we have troubles—"than the Pleiades. Neither the quantity nor the quality of the silver," says he, "has anything to do with it. If your coinage was free you would still have the trouble. If you had no coinage at all you would be in the same predicament. The existing Bland law does not cause the distress." What is it then? Wreckers. Now I must say that I owe both the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Ohio [General WARNER] a grudge: That here they have been all this session, and a good part of the last, trying to persuade me and other gentlemen in the House that the stoppage of free coinage was one of the most potent causes of commercial and industrial depression, and yet all they had to do was to consult the gentleman from Georgia, and they would have learned that the real cause was what he is pleased to call wreckers. A change in the tariff, reduced taxation, limited or unlimited coinage—none of these will account, in the opinion of this eminent savant for the existing troubles; troubles which at one moment he says exist not only in this country but in others, and in the very next denies.

And yet the gentleman is skillful in diagnosis. He dissected the case of the gentleman of Iowa with remarkable skill; and, if I remember, concluded that his disease was cerebro-elephantiasis. When I think of the undue proportions into which the gentleman has permitted his imagination to swell these wreckers, and the entire subordination of all other causes of trouble to this one, I am inclined to think there is a cerebral disease from which he is suffering more terrible still. It is cerebro-spinal meningitis, and, as the gentleman has such a marked tendency always to curve backward in search of a real or imaginary caudal appendage, I suppose it must be of the opisthotonous type. I am quite sure, from the rabies which seizes him whenever Wall street is named, causing an explosion of all his wrath, that it must be of the fulminant form—a sort of thunder-and-lightning disease. But whatever the matter may be, it is certain that Doctor MORRISON, with his tariff, and Doctor BLAND, with his silver, are the purest of quacks, besides this Galen with his wreckers. Let us have a bill at once to suppress the wreckers, and let the wan cheek of the Goddess of Liberty grow fresh again, and Lombard street stop hallooing across the ocean to New York and fooling that innocent old Polonius of Wall street into believing that a cloud is a whale.

Why I thought that Wall street could tell a hawk from a handsaw, particularly if the wind was southerly. One of the chief characteristics of Polonius, if I remember, was by indirections to find directions out. And the crooked, circuitous method of a debased coinage may be the way to an improved commercial condition, but I think it is well enough to remember the fate of the old man, and I particularly commend it to the gentleman from Georgia. He was behind the arras, was he not, eavesdropping when Prince Hamlet cried "A rat, a rat," as he made the fatal thrust at what he supposed was the king's breast? Such is the end of all crookedness and of all covert assaults, for whatever purpose made.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen who favor the unlimited coinage of silver or the continuance of the present monthly coinage of silver have urged that the present supply of gold and silver coinage is inadequate to the business of the country, and consequently prices of the products and commodities of the country are too low and business is depressed; that the increase of legal-tender coin of gold and silver has not kept pace with the demands of trade and the increase of property, therefore prices have fallen—that prices have gradually but constantly fallen to the scale of 1845–'49, the lowest, I believe, that we have had in this country, is conceded, consequently it is urged that by the free coinage of silver money will be made cheaper, 20 per cent. cheaper some say, and to that extent the debtors will be enabled by law the more easily to pay their creditors and prices advanced.

It is insisted in support of the above theories that gold has increased in value, that silver has not decreased in value, and that the other commodities and property have not decreased in value as measured by silver bullion. The value of gold, silver, and the baser metals, the products of manufacturers and the farmers, so long as they are being produced by organized labor, depend largely upon the cost of their production. I propose first to call the attention of the House to the unprecedented increase in the production of the farmers and manufacturers in those later years that are marked by a decline in their prices. I say at the outset that I utterly deny the proposition that silver bullion has retained its commercial value as compared either with gold or the other products of this country, or the world if you please, but insist that its present market price marks the extent of the decline below the value of gold and the other products bought and sold in the market of the world, and I call the attention of the House, first, to the in the United States as compared with the ten previous years. In the production of wheat from 1870 to 1879 the average annual yield or crop was 312,152,728 bushels. For the last four years it has been 463,973,318 bushels—an increase of over 150,000,000 bushels.

OATS.

The average production between 1870 and 1879 was 314,431,178 bushels. For 1880 and 1881 it was 495,509,478 bushels—an increase of 180,000,000 bushels. But returning to wheat, from 1874 to 1881 the wheat product of Europe averaged 1,150,000,000 bushels; the annual increase since then upon that production has been 100,000,000 bushels.

The exportations from the Australian to the European markets have increased from 9,517,217 bushels in 1881 to 18,419,561 in 1884.

The exportations from India to the European market have increased from 4,109,495 bushels in 1880 to 39,202,636 bushels in 1884.

The increase in our manufactures has been equally great. Of raw material consumed in the manufacture of wool, the increase from 1870 to 1880 was 68,000,000 pounds.

The value of the annual productions of the manufacturers of wool in the United States had increased in 1881 above that of 1868, $92,000,000, with a reduction on the price of the goods of at least 10 per cent., and I may remark in this connection that the consumer has since 1860, notwithstanding the decrease in the price of material worn, increased the value of his annual consumption over 50 per cent.

The increase of the production of wool has been great. Between 1871 and 1880 it was 200,000,000 pounds; but the increase in the last five years has equaled that of the previous ten years. The imports into Europe increased from 447,521,441 pounds in 1881, to 518,637,800 pounds in 1884. The American production has doubled since 1870, and increased 25 per cent. since 1880. The number of sheep is greater by 20,000,000 now than in 1870. Importations to this country of wool and its products, $44,656,482.

In the production of cotton goods since 1879 the increase has been 30 per cent. Importations of cotton goods, $27,000,000. In the production of cotton itself the increase has been from 3,275,000 bales in 1861–'65 to 5,351,000 bales in 1866–'73, 6,687,000 bales in 1871–'75, 6,923,000 in 1876–'80, and 8,285,000 in 1881–'85.

In sugar the increase has been equally marked; from 4,000,000 tons in 1881 to 4,717,000 tons in 1884.

As to iron, the productive capacity of this country is between six and seven million net tons, but the actual consumption is less than five.

Our productive capacity for steel rails is 1,500,000 tons, with a consumption of only 1,000,000 tons.

The productive capacity of the country in reference to both iron and steel goods is in excess of the consumption of the country, except in reference to tin plates, iron and steel wire rods, and very thin sheets, and with this condition of things there is an annual importation into our markets from abroad of thirty-five millions of dollars' worth of iron and steel goods.

Do we not find in this immense increase of production both from the land and from the shops sufficient cause for our low prices without looking further?

I have before me a comparison of prices for different periods, which shows that low prices have invariably accompanied excessive and enlarged production. But the decrease in prices has not been as great as the increase in production, due doubtless to the fact that with the volume of currency, in connection with other facilities—checks, drafts, and bills of exchange—there has been less purchasing power in gold or less necessity for gold. I have called attention to the staple products of our farms and factories to illustrate my position; but my selections have not been exceptional, and I might as well, for the purposes of my argument, have taken other products than those I have chosen. In connection with some of them, I have called attention to the importations of the class or kind, to show that, notwithstanding the overproduction and the great competition here, which of itself would have forced down prices, foreign competion has also added its force in the same direction.

And in this connection I will call attention briefly to the effect of cheapened transportation since 1865 upon prices. In that year the charge on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad per ton per mile on all merchandise was 3.451 cents; in 1885 it was reduced to sixty-eight hundredths of a cent. The change has been equally great upon the Lake Shore. The eight principal railroads centering in Chicago in 1870 moved the equal of 1,900,000,000 tons of freight 1 mile at 2.227 cents a ton; in 1884, 6,525,000,000 tons 1 mile at 1.071 cents per ton. The transportation of that volume of freight at the rate of 1870 would have cost $98,600,000 more than it did cost.

I have no doubt that prices upon those roads for those years represent the difference in cost between those two periods on all the railroads in the United States; and if so, there was a saving of $500,000,000 to the consumer in freights alone, and very largely in agricultural products.

Our railroads have increased in extent from 34,000 miles in 1864 to 128,000 in 1885.

I suppose grain, off water and railroad transportation, would eat itself up in transportation 150 miles.

To-day the farmer of Dakota sells his wheat for the English market. Mark, therefore, the effect railroad transportation alone has had in increasing the amount of grain marketed and lessening the cost to the producer of placing it in market, both reducing the price to the consumer.

I have conceded that it is true that we are back to the prices of 1840 to 1850. The comparisons I have made, the facts stated, prove conclusively that the reduction of prices is due to the great increase of production in connection with the increased facilities for marketing the same with the lessened cost thereof, as compared with the periods of low prices from 1840 to 1850.

I assert that all we produce is at one-half the labor-cost of the period from 1840 to 1850. I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this question. What I say is, that labor has doubled its product since 1850 by the aid of labor-saving machines. This is true with respect to the farm and the factory, the furnaces and the forges. There is not an industry but that one day's labor to-day increases its products above that of 1850, and in many industries the increase has been 200, 300, 400, and 500 per cent. Why, then, are not prices lower even than they are now? It certainly can only be accounted for upon the theory that the cost of the production of gold or the necessity for its use has decreased still more. If the price depends upon the volume of the legal-tender coin, then with this doubling up of production without increase of cost, the prices must have fallen still lower but for the fact that money is cheaper and has retained only one-half its purchasing power.

Now, sir, it is not gold that has appreciated in value as compared with other products. It has depreciated greatly, depreciated as compared to the period prior to 1850 far more than the other commodities. For if the precious metals had maintained only the same relative proportions for the necessities and convenience of business and the market of 1885 they held in 1849, and no greater, 50 per cent. off the cost of production, now, as then, would have reduced, at the same cost for labor, prices nearly 50 per cent; but notwithstanding this great increase of production without increase of cost, the wages of labor have steadily advanced and are now at their highest point, double at least what they were in 1840–'50. The power of labor applied to new appliances and inventions, facilities and forces, has doubled its capacity and power to produce.

We are not suffering under a contraction of metallic currency or the contraction of any kind of currency. At this time it is double what it has been in any year since 1860, and it is unprofitable to make tables exhibiting the per capita money circulation in other nations now or even in this nation in the past. Within twenty years the manner of transacting business here has all changed. That change was consummated with the full adoption of the national-bank system, and currency, whether of gold, silver, bank notes, or Treasury notes, for use as circulation, has become subsidiary in our business. We carry it in our pockets for the little needs of life, but not for use in those transactions which make up the trade and commerce, the business of a town, city, State, and of the whole country, and in which checks, drafts, and bills of exchange are employed.

I suppose the aggregate daily volume of business transacted in this country by the aid of checks, drafts, and bills of exchange is $300,000,000. At least 95 per cent. of all money transactions are by their aid. They purchase and pay, and practically their immense volume in use is an increase, an expansion of our currency, and the volume of currency that would be needed, except for the business transacted through them, no man can estimate.

In England I suppose as large a percentage of business is done by their aid as in this country. Ninety-five per cent. of all the business and the per capita circulation required by a nation that does not make use of them, or of a nation before it made such use, is no guide for a people who do.

If checks, drafts, and bills of exchange are used to any considerable extent in France, it is of very recent date. I have seen nothing in regard to Germany. England and the United States have taken the lead, and no nation can adopt this method of transacting its business without decreasing the volume of metallic currency needed for use.

I suppose that practically all the balances in our international trade are settled in that way, and thus the transmission of coin avoided, its use diminished, and the necessities for its increase likewise diminished.

APPEAL TO THE DEBTOR CLASS.

I must now address myself briefly to the appeal that has been made to the debtor to give his support to this legislation. My argument will be addressed to the wage-workers and debtors of the country. The sum of $5,000,000,000 is annually paid to the wage-workers in the United States. The proposition is to reduce its purchasing power one-fifth, at an annual cost of $1,000,000,000 to those who depend upon wages for the support of themselves and their families in all they buy. That is the argument, that in just so far as gold is at a premium above silver in our local market the price of commodities will be increased. This is true, for the prices in the markets of the world are gold prices and have been practically for sixty years. We buy and sell in that market, and there the prices are made, and in as far as the money we use here is cheaper, poorer, or of less value than gold, the prices of goods rise.

I have before me the foreign trade of the great merchant nations of the world. Gold is their standard of value.

Table showing the foreign trade of the countries named.

Their merchants settle their balances in gold and a gold price is placed upon every article we buy or sell.

Who can change all this? I will not say that the lawmaking powers of all the trading nations of the earth can not do it, yet I doubt it.

So long as gold is the most stable in its value and the more nearly in its cost of production, and from its quantity the best measure of the value of practically all other articles bought and sold in the markets of the world, merchants will use it as a standard of value. It is in recognition of this fact that England, the great power and factor in commerce, for sixty years has adopted it. Other nations have demonetized gold or maintained the double standard, yet the balances of trade were still settled in gold. Gold made the prices of everything. Nations borrowed and paid in it. There is something in all this more than an act of Parliament or of Congress.

Commerce has its laws as wholly independent of Congressional legislation as our natural laws, and he only is a wise statesman who aids in their free operations by statutory enactments.

Now the other great trading nations of Europe, the higher civilization of Europe, have re-enforced England and adopted the gold standard, and the United States alone proposes to change this law of trade. I repeat you will not change the price of goods except in our domestic market. As you propose to buy with a debased, a cheap, and an inflated currency the merchant will allow you for it its value in gold. You will have demonetized most effectually silver; its value will daily change, depending upon the supply of gold here, the state of our foreign trade, and speculation will become an element in that value. Then you may fear Wall street and money centers and combinations of capital in their operations, changing daily, as they will the purchasing power of silver, its value in payment for property, and most of all in its payment for labor.

We had a full experience in all that in the years of the war and before resumption. Here, then, poor and weak men attempted to regulate by legislation the laws of trade, and the laws of values were above them and more potent and a day of settlement came under those laws and the bankrupt courts administered them.

If you have two kinds of coin moving of an unequal value, who will have the poorer? The debtor. His necessities will compel him to accept it. The man who has money, who has property, whose profit and loss account shows a surplus, can keep what he has at least, and the result is he takes his choice; he has money to lend, the banks have money to lend, rich men have money to lend, and those who have money now will still have it and they will lend, and when the bond is written the rate of interest will always be high enough to cover the present and prospective depreciation in the money that the debtor may discharge it in, and the rate of interest will be increased.

The country now and for years has felt most disastrously the effect of the threat of this legislation. For years it has been understood that the Cotton States were prominently identified with this movement. Having reference to their people those States are debtor States, and to obtain cheap money with which to pay, by Federal legislation, has been popular in them, but capital has been distrustful of those people. Their opinions have been constantly advertised in Congress, mainly through representatives here having agitated the question. But I hail as a joyful sign of the times the fact that gentlemen from the State of South Carolina have voiced in this debate the sentiments, as I trust, of some of the people of that State in favor of honest money; and I say to them they have done more for their State in inspiring confidence in capital to develop her industries, than they or I can estimate.

The result of the agitation has been that the farmer in my State, New York, can now borrow $300 for his business, to plant, harvest, and market at the same cost in interest that the planter in any one of the States I have mentioned pays for $100. The young man can buy his farm in New York in part upon credit and pay no more for $3,000, secured by a mortgage upon his farm, than the Southern planter pays for $1,000, or $1,200 at the outside. Why this difference? The securities are equally good, the Southern soil the more fruitful, and the cost of transmitting money nominal. Simply because of the difference of the estimates placed upon the paying qualities, the honesty of the debtors in the two sections, by capital, and the silver agitation is mostly at the bottom of this distrust. I have seen in I suppose half a dozen speeches estimates made of the amount of mortgages upon real estate in this country, in statements always made more or less violently, in the form of an appeal to adopt unlimited silver because thereby you will cheat the creditors out of 20 per cent. of the sums due them. To those gentlemen I say, for this declamation, it is not argument, you have been for years paying the penalty in the high rate of interest those mortgages bear.

There is near $600,000,000 in the savings-banks, trust, loan, and mortgage companies of New York alone returning to these companies less than 5 and probably not more than 4 per cent. per annum. Is not the security for a loan upon a farm in Kansas or in Texas as good as upon a farm in New York? Certainly. Yet the rate of interest is 75 per cent. more in Kansas and 200 per cent. more in Texas than in New York.

This subject requires a plain discussion. I admit the investor prefers to have his money near home and the great cause is this distrust of the debtor created and nourished by these constant threats of depreciating the currency—repudiation, capital calls it—made by public men. Admit that you will be legally entitled to pay off the present mortgages in a cheap money, a large proportion of them are due—all are on short credit. You will not decrease the amount, and from the moment this bill passes, with the distrust of credits, interest will advance and the burden upon the debtor class will be increased. This attempt to distribute property by legislation will prove futile. Wealth and property in this country can only be acquired by labor of hands and brains, and not by legislation.

You may continue the present coinage; I see no other result from it except in a limited degree the same conditions that free coinage will produce. With the power to pay all taxes and customs duties in silver, the flow of gold from the Treasury will be slow but none the less certain, and whenever the Government is forced to pay in silver gold must go to a premium.

The United States is now united with the other highly-civilized nations of the world in maintaining a gold standard. Without their cooperation silver must continue to hold the position of domestic coin in its circulation.

This nation is rich, educated, has the highest civilization, and is prosperous in all that constitutes greatness; is one of the first-class powers of the world, able and should be willing to pay and discharge national obligations in the best-coined money of the world, as all other nations do. My State, New York, Massachusetts, and doubtless other States have set an example for the General Government, and paid in gold when it was at a high premium. It has been said the Secretary of the Treasury has not forced the silver upon the country, and therefore it is in the vaults; in this you admit the people do not want silver, at least prefer gold, and do gentlemen want this great, rich nation, powerful in intelligence, in wealth, and in arms, to pay in poorer money than other nations pay in? It would be national dishonor. Do not deceive yourselves. Your constituents, the people, do not want it.

The step now proposed, if taken, and I refer both to the free coinage of silver or the continuance of the present coinage, will class her with the lower civilization of Europe and the still lower civilization of Africa and Asia.

National repudiation and dishonor are involved in it.

One other suggestion, and I will conclude.

I have before me the aggregate money circulation of this country, by years, since and including 1860:

Of this about six hundred millions is in gold. The withdrawal of that volume will have an effect which I have no time to discuss. It will no longer be employed in the payment of customs duties. Silver will be the cheaper, and will therefore be used, and to the extent it is cheaper, to the amount of the premium on gold you will reduce the duties now paid upon imported goods. Reduce the tariff! Mechanics, manufacturers, farmers, dependent as you are upon the home market to-day, protectionists all, I invite you to the consideration of this question. It will be a horizontal reduction!

Mr. BLAND'S table in the report of the minority makes it a 20 per cent. reduction, precisely what Mr. MORRISON wanted two years ago. There will be no discrimination. It means lower wages; it means the destruction of some industries and the paralyzation of all. It means in the most aggravated form that which this Congress has threatened the country with at this session.

There is no object in encountering or risking any of these perils. No one here makes a war on bimetallism; but bimetallism can only be attained by one standard by which gold and silver will both be measured.

The threatened legislation, if once had, will produce monometallism by the exclusion of gold from our currency, and bimetallism will only be restored after a season of disturbed finances, dishonor, and bankruptcy. [Applause.]

At the conclusion of Mr. HISCOCK'S remarks he yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. JAMES.

Mr. JAMES. I yield two minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has only two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HEWITT. If I could have got time, which I am sorry I have not been able to get, I should have tried in reference to the pending proposition to enforce two conclusions: First, that the passage of a bill for the free coinage of silver would confiscate one-fifth of the accumulated savings of the working classes, amounting in the State of New York alone to $1,000,000,000. In other words, it would wipe out $200,000,000 of their savings. And secondly, that the immediate effect of this bill would be to reduce the purchasing power of the wages of labor 20 per cent., which in the present state of business of the country would be a hardship so grievous that no legislator, no man of business, no man with a heart in his body would, except in ignorance of the consequences, venture to advocate such a measure. And lastly, I would have tried to suggest a remedy for the anomalous condition in which the gold and silver coinage of the country now finds itself. All I can do is briefly to insert in the RECORD the skeleton of the remarks which I would have made at greater length if I could have got more time.

Mr. HEWITT'S further remarks are as follows:

In the long debate upon the silver question it is admitted by both sides that we are now upon the gold basis. It is a fact that the dollar containing 25.8 grains of gold, which by law is the unit of value, will purchase at its present market value 480 grains of silver. It is also a fact that the standard silver dollar contains only 412½ grains of silver. Hence if we open the mints to the unlimited coinage of silver no man will pay debts with gold dollars worth 480 grains of silver when he can take 412½ grains of silver to pay the debt and have 68½ grains left in his pocket as profit.

The unlimited coinage of silver, therefore, will transfer us from the gold to the silver standard. The business of the country, now adjusted to the gold standard, must readjust itself to the silver standard. As to outstanding contracts not specifically made payable in gold, there will be a transfer of 20 per cent. of capital from the creditors to the debtors. There can now be no justification for such an act of spoliation. Under the stress of a war for national existence such a transfer of property was made by the issue of irredeemable paper money.

And again a similar transfer was made when specie payments were resumed. In both cases the rich were made richer and the poor poorer. But when the silver dollar was demonetized no change in the relations of debtors and creditors was made, because we were not in 1873 upon either a gold or silver basis, but were in the abyss of fiat money. Whether demonetization was accomplished surreptitiously or not, as it was not, no injury was done or could be done to any human being. But now we are paying in gold. Every creditor and every wage-earner who now gets gold will, if this bill should pass, get silver worth 20 per cent. less than the present unit of value.

There will be a profit to some one. Who will gain and who will lose? For it is inconceivable that the opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver on the ratio of 16 to 1 of gold will be sufficient to restore the actual value to this ratio. The free coinage of silver does in India not do it; the free coinage of silver by the Latin Union did not preserve the ratio of 15½ to 1. To save their gold they were forced to abandon the free coinage of silver. But on the face of it the proposition is absurd that the possible annual coinage of our mints could materially affect the value of the vast mass of silver in the world, estimated at $6,000,000,000. Who, then, are the debtors who will profit and the creditors who will lose? Are they the rich or the poor?

The banks and capitalists can and do always keep their assets practically on a gold basis. So far as they hold real property or merchandise the rise in value will be immediate and proportioned to the reduction in the standard of value. Only indebtedness for fixed sums, such as mortgage loans, will not rise, because they can not rise, in value. Now this class of property is mainly owned by estates, trust companies, life insurance companies, and savings-banks. In the State of New York alone the assets of these corporations exceed $1,000,000,000, upon which the loss will be $200,000,000. The owners of this vast fund are widows, orphans, helpless wards, artisans, laborers, and sewing women. They are largely my constituents. In their behalf I have presented to this House the petition of the savings-banks, representing over one hundred thousand depositors, praying that this act of injustice shall not be committed. The proposed change of standard can not therefore benefit those who have accumulated a fund against old age, sickness, and want.

But if it will deprive them of a part of their savings it will also take away a part of their daily wages. For everything which the laboring man buys, food, clothing, and shelter, will advance at once to conform to the new standard of value, whereas his wages will not advance except by slow steps, spread over a long term of years. The conclusive demonstration of Mr. Walker on this subject has been cited by others, but further evidence is furnished by the condition of affairs in India, where, as is triumphantly asserted by the friends of this bill, prices of the food products, representing the earnings of labor, have not advanced, and hence it is possible for the first time to export them to England, where they are sold for gold, convertible into silver at a premium, which is not added to the wages of labor, or this export trade would cease. The remedy proposed by this bill is the reduction of wages here so as to meet the competition of India. The wage-earner then will be chief sufferer by a change in the standard of value, and the old process by which the fruits of industry are transferred to the capitalists will be repeated under the guize of justice and charity to the poor man.

The truth is that it is possible thus to rob the workman of his earnings and to reduce his wages, but you can not displace gold from the position which it has won on its own intrinsic merits as the best and least variable standard of value. There is no deficiency of money for the business of the world. It was never so cheap as it is now for acceptable securities, and no increase in its volume can make it plenty for unacceptable securities unless you make it worthless, which I do not understand to be the purpose or the expectation of the friends of silver. But the free coinage of silver will not add to the volume of money. It will only displace a corresponding quantity of other money. Silver has its proper place in the circulation of the world as the chief money of poor countries where the wages of labor are low, but in rich countries, able, as we are, to pay a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, it is useful only as a subsidiary coin to the extent that it is needed in small transactions, but always to be kept at par with gold by certain redemption in gold. This is the present condition of our coinage, and this parity of value can and ought to be maintained, provided we do not coin so much silver that it can not be redeemed in gold. Otherwise, as the least valuable money, it must drive gold out of circulation.

To maintain this desirable condition of parity in value legislation is needed, but not for the free coinage of silver, nor for the increase in the weight of the dollar. The true policy is to coin as much silver as the people desire to use in the ordinary course of business and no more. Repeal all compulsion to coin any specified amount, but require to be coined, as now, only for the account of the Government, all that shall be called for. There will then never be an excessive issue of silver and never any dead silver capital in the Treasury, upon which we lose interest, and one of the most available commodities for export.

This result can be accomplished by the adoption of a brief bill, which I have introduced into every Congress since the passage of the so-called Bland bill, the paternity of which I am glad to see the gentleman from Missouri very properly disowns. This bill I shall offer at the proper time as a substitute for the pending measure. I ask now that it be printed for the information of the House.

A bill to secure a uniform standard of value.

Whereas, under the constitutional power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," Congress has established a common unit of value, and provided for the free coinage of gold coins conforming thereto, and has further provided for the coinage of a standard silver dollar, which is intended and ought to be the equivalent of the said unit of value: Now, therefore, in order to secure and forever maintain the equality of the said standard silver dollar with the legal unit of value,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the gold and silver coins of the United States which are a full legal tender shall hereafter be interchangeable at their lawful value, either for the other, upon the demand of any holder thereof, at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, when presented in sums of $100 or any multiple thereof; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for such interchange, and to cause to be coined such amount of standard silver dollars as may be found necessary, from time to time, in order to meet the demand for such dollars; and that all provisions of law fixing or limiting the amount to be coined of such standard silver dollars be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

This bill recognizes gold as the unit of value, because its title to this distinction is based upon the eternal fitness of things in the gradual evolution of society from barbarism with rude appliances to the highest civilization, in which only the best tools and the most effective agencies are employed in the varied operations of life.

We are now the richest and most prosperous nation in the world, with larger exchanges of products than any other nation, using and requiring the best instruments of exchange, in railways, steamers, and telegraphs, with which no sane man would dispense; and yet we are seriously asked to give up gold, the best lubricator of commerce, which sets and keeps them all in motion at the least cost, and substitute silver, an inferior and variable standard of value, expensive to handle, uncertain in purchasing power, and fit only in this age of vast development for subsidiary uses, to which happily the law assigns it, and from which it never should be, as it never can be, divorced, even by act of Congress; for if gold is king in the domain of commerce it is king by a divine right in the law of social evolution, which no human agency can arrest or destroy.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, representatives of the savings-banks of the State of New York, respectfully submit that they hold in trust for over one million one hundred and sixty-five thousand persons their savings, averaging about $375 for each depositor, and aggregating the sum of over $437,000,000; that all the funds and property of the said savings-banks and all their earnings and accumulations belong exclusively to their depositors, chiefly industrious persons of small means, and that your petitioners have no interest therein except as custodians for said depositors. As such representatives we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to repeal the law which directs the coinage of the 412½-grain silver dollars.

We heartily agree with the opinions expressed upon this subject by the President of the United States in his recent message, and we pray that it may please Congress to enact that the said coinage be discontinued, for the reason, among many others of weight, that its continuance, unregulated by the demands of trade or by the ability of the circulation to absorb it, tends to sever our currency from the gold standard, to compromise the national credit, and to create distrust in the minds of the people.

To make our securities, principal and interest, payable in silver dollars, and thereby to reduce the exchange value of the savings of the people by 20 per cent., would be a loss of purchasing power of the funds in the savings-banks of New York State alone equivalent to a shrinkage in value of nearly $100,000,000; and, as the value of the currency would be alike impaired whether in savings-banks or elsewhere, this vast sum would represent only a small portion of the loss to be apprehended from the continued compulsory coinage of the standard silver dollars, the greater portion of which loss must be borne by the industrial classes whose interests we serve.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

The following savings-banks have signed the above petition: Brooklyn Savings-Bank, Williamsburg Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Citizen's Savings-Bank, Harlem Savings-Bank, New York Savings-Bank, New York; Dime Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Seamen's Savings-Bank, Greenwich Savings-Bank, New York; Oneida County Savings-Bank, Rome; East Brooklyn Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Mechanics and Farmers' Savings-Bank, Albany; East River Savings-Bank, German Savings-Bank, Excelsior Savings-Bank, New York; Troy Savings-Bank, Troy; Albany Savings-Bank, Albany; Merchants' Clerks Savings-Bank, Metropolitan Savings-Bank, Irving Savings-Bank, Franklin Savings-Bank, New York; Middletown Savings-Bank, Orange County; Rochester Savings-Bank, Rochester; Rhinebeck Savings-Bank, Rhinebeck; South Brooklyn Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Fulton Savings-Bank, Oswego; Binghamton Savings-Bank, Binghamton; Buffalo Savings-Bank, Buffalo; Ithaca Savings-Bank, Tompkins County; American Savings-Bank, New York; Westchester County Savings-Bank, Tarrytown; Albany Exchange Savings-Bank, Albany; Mutual Savings-Bank, Troy; Rome Savings-Bank, Rome; Erie County Savings-Bank, Buffalo; Wappingers Savings-Bank, Fishkill Savings-Bank, Dutchess County; Broadway Savings-Bank, New York; Germania Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Goshen Savings-Bank, Goshen; German Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Dime Savings-Bank, Williamburg; Long Island City Savings-Bank, Long Island City; Saugerties Savings-Bank, Saugerties; Queens County Savings-Bank, Flushing; Peekskill Savings-Bank, Peekskill; Walden Savings-Bank, Orange County; Putnam County Savings-Bank, Brewsters; Emigrant Industrial Savings-Bank, New York; Catskill Savings-Bank, Catskill; Union Dime Savings-Bank, Dry Dock Savings-Bank, New York; Bushwick Savings-Bank, Brooklyn; Warwick Savings-Bank, Orange County; Poughkeepsie Savings-Bank, Poughkeepsie; Cohoes Savings-Bank, Cohoes; Home Savings-Bank, Albany; Port Chester Savings-Bank, Port Chester; Newburgh Savings-Bank, Newburgh; Mechanics' Savings-Bank, Fishkill; Southold Savings-Bank, Long Island; Manhattan Savings-Bank, New York city; New Paltz Savings-Bank, Ulster County; Hudson City Savings-Bank, Hudson; Riverhead Savings-Bank, Suffolk County; Bowery

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the Senate of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 44) providing for the erection of a public building at San Antonio, Tex.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under the instruction of my committee I made a motion yesterday to recommit this bill, simply for the purpose of withdrawing the motion at this time and permitting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES]. I now ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that other amendments ought to be allowed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion made by him yesterday to recommit this bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask first to have read the amendment for which the gentleman proposes to yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that all amendments proposed to be offered will be allowed to come in.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, it is understood by the members of our committee on both sides of this question that it is desirable that the proposition to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] refers shall be permitted to come in, and that unanimous consent be given for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks that the amendment which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] proposes to admit shall be read before objection is heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow my amendment to be read?

Mr. BLAND. I will, later.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] will offer the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I must object to any amendment coming in unless all amendments are received. I also wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] objects to the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT. Unless other amendments also can be read, I must object. It is not fair that one proposition shall be offered and read to this House while others are excluded.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection, however, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] withdrawing his motion to recommit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to let my amendment be read.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to hearing it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]?

Mr. RANDALL. What was the motion?

The SPEAKER. Simply a request to be permitted to withdraw the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to hearing the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. JAMES. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. When that motion has been withdrawn, then, under the order of the House, is not the previous question pending upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. Under the order made yesterday the previous question will be pending at half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I yielded the floor to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] merely to offer an amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. One moment. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman the right to yield the floor, the previous question having been ordered?

Mr. JAMES. It has not been ordered yet, sir.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House was that the previous question should be considered as ordered at half past 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. DIBBLE. I send up the amendment which I offer in behalf of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That unless meantime, through concurrent action of the nations of Europe with the United States, silver be remonetized prior to July 1, 1889, that then and thereafter so much of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," as authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion and cause the same to be coined, shall be suspended until further action by Congress.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, my object is, in case this amendment be adopted, to offer a further amendment providing for a commission——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I send up an amendment which I offer as a proviso to the first section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that while one amendment is pending to the text of the bill another amendment is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the amendment of the gentleman [Mr. DIBBLE] was offered as a substitute.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the amendment be read for information.

Mr. HEWITT. Is it to be read by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HEWITT. Then I must object, as I also have an amendment to offer.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] to be offered as a substitute for the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I offer mine as a proviso to the first section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] offered his amendment, as the Chair understood, as a second section of the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; as a proviso to the first section.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. JAMES rose.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] has the floor.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is not in order if it is objected to. It is in order under the rules of the House if the gentleman has the floor. The Chair did not understand whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] yielded the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or not.

Mr. JAMES. I have not yielded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not exactly good faith, because it was understood that amendments would be offered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If amendments are to be admitted, Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen wish to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot control that. The rules of the House must control. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] had the floor and yielded to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]——

Mr. JAMES. For a purpose.

The SPEAKER. To offer an amendment. The gentleman from New York states that he did not yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and he [Mr. JAMES] had the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Only to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] says he did not yield the floor. He is in charge of the bill.

Mr. JAMES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, until half past 5 o'clock, to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] has no further time.

Mr. JAMES. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House one hour is allowed to close the debate, and that hour the gentleman yielded to his colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the gentleman from New York yielded it back——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], after occupying the floor, had two minutes remaining, which were yielded to the other gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] did not occupy his entire time.

The SPEAKER. He occupied all except two minutes.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] had the right to an hour to close the debate. His hour would expire at half past 5 o'clock, the time when the previous question becomes operative; and consequently he is entitled to the remaining time, which he has been kind enough to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. The closing hour of the gentleman from New York began at twenty minutes past 4 o'clock. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] occupied all that time except two minutes, which he yielded to the other gentleman from New York; so that the entire hour was occupied.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has that been verified by the Speaker's clerk?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] did not occupy the whole of the two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rapped the gentleman down, his two minutes having expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Did not the allotment of time for debate extend to half past 5?

The SPEAKER. It did; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LITTLE], a member of the committee, did not occupy his hour by ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. Did he not reserve the remainder of his time?

The SPEAKER. He yielded the floor.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain no proposition until gentlemen resume their seats so that business can proceed in order. [A pause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the hour of half past 5 o'clock having arrived, the previous question is now pending under the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JAMES. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The previous question in now operating by order of the House, the hour of half past 5 o'clock having arrived. The first question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE.]

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That unless meantime through concurrent action of the nations of Europe with the United States silver be remonetized prior to July 1, 1889, that then and thereafter so much of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character" as authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion and cause the same to be coined shall be suspended until further action by Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. On that amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; 69 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 200, not voting 39; as follows:

He also introduced a bill (S. 2092) granting an increase of pension to John M. Demaree; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2093) granting an increase of pension to William J. Stewart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2094) granting a pension to Harris Fulford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2095) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Hook; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2096) granting a pension to Charles C. Hill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2097) for the relief of Nimrod Jarrett Smith, as chief of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMDEN introduced a bill (S. 2099) for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

UNEXPENDED BALANCES OF CLAIMS APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a schedule, in the usual form, of all claims (exclusive of those forwarded to the Forty-ninth Congress) allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, for the payment of which no appropriations have been made by Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further "concurrent or other" resolutions?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I presume under this order it is proper that I should move to take up Order of Business 163, being a resolution for the consideration of executive nominations in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 163, being a resolution submitted by Mr. PLATT declaring that executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session. The Senate having made a special order for this time it requires the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will state my motive in asking to take up the resolution. I can not see in the Journal or RECORD anywhere that the Senator from Connecticut gave notice of his purpose to take up the resolution on Monday. That is just what I want to find out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not here at the time, but he is advised that a special arrangement was made for this morning after the conclusion of the routine business. The Chair will refer to it in a moment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he gave such a notice, and whether it was agreed to take up the resolution on Monday?

Mr. PLATT. As the Senator from Virginia appeals to me, I will ask unanimous consent to say a word. I gave notice last week, early in the week, that I should endeavor on Wednesday or Thursday to call up the resolution which was introduced by me, referred to the Committee on Rules, reported by the committee, and at my request placed on the Calendar.

I have felt that perhaps I was entitled in some small degree to control its consideration, and I have been as anxious, I assure the Senator from Virginia, as he or any one is to call it up and have it disposed of, certainly to be heard myself upon it. I have been ready at any time to present my views to the Senate. I did say to the Senator from Virginia yesterday that I intended to give notice that I should endeavor to call it up on Monday; but yesterday I was told that perhaps the business might take such a turn that I might be able to speak upon the resolution this afternoon, and therefore I did not give the notice.

I shall endeavor on Monday immediately after the morning business to get consideration for the resolution. I have felt that it is an important matter, but I have not wished to disturb what seemed to be the orderly proceedings in the Senate upon other matters. I shall endeavor on Monday to get consideration for it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to remind the Senator from Connecticut that yesterday I gave notice that on the first legislative day after to-day I should feel it my duty to ask the Senate to consider the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PLATT. May I say one word in reply to that suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is not in order.

Mr. FRYE. Unanimous consent was given yesterday that a certain resolution should be taken up immediately after the morning business to-day, and I hope no more time will be consumed. I want very much to improve the time which is left.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to ask, inasmuch as I have the floor, whether the morning business is concluded when the Chair has announced that "concurrent or other resolutions are in order."

Mr. FRYE. That does not apply to resolutions on the Calendar at all.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I hold that the morning business is not concluded until that order has been gone through with. I want to have an understanding, and that is all. I do not want to be too persistent, but the resolution which I called up is certainly morning business if it is anything. It is not a concurrent resolution, and is only covered by the word "other" in the phrase "concurrent or other resolutions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that to call up a resolution which had been previously introduced requires the same motion that would be made as to any other business, and is not what is usually considered a "concurrent or other resolution." That order of business relates to the introduction of concurrent or other resolutions. But the Chair feels bound——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to make myself clear to the Senate, if you please, by stating that I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause for a moment and not interrupt the Chair.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I withdraw my motion because the Senator from Connecticut has given notice that he will call the resolution up on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before any further business is proceeded with the Chair will lay before the Senate the unanimous agreement made yesterday, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Maine that, at the expiration of the morning business to-morrow, the resolution indicated by him, relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain, shall be taken up for consideration? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

TRANSMISSION OF METEOROLOGICAL REPORTS.

Mr. CONGER. I desire that order to be carried out; but I ask unanimous consent at this time to call up the bill (S. 2004) authorizing the transmission of weather reports, storm and flood warnings, and the announcement of the approach of cold waves, through the mails free of postage. It is a very short bill, and at this time of the year especially it is important that the bill should be passed by the Senate. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I shall not object to the consideration of any bill which can be concluded to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I trust Senators will not object to it. It is a very brief bill.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not take the time now. I have been about two months in undertaking to get here this morning.

Mr. CONGER. I am in perfect accord with the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that, but I do not see why he should take the time now.

Mr. CONGER. It is a very brief bill, and it is very important if it is to pass and become a law it should be passed immediately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act establishing post-roads, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail matter, be, and is hereby, extended to all observers and agents co-operating with the Signal Service in collecting meteorological reports for the benefit of commerce and agriculture; and that all official mail matter relating to weather reports or containing warnings of the approach of storms, floods, frosts, or cold waves may be transmitted through the mails free of postage; the envelopes containing said mail matter in all cases to bear an appropriate indorsement of the name and address of the observer from whom the same is transmitted, under the words "official business, weather reports," with a statement of the penalty for their misuse.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the necessity of inserting a statement that for any violation or abuse the existing penalties shall apply. As it now is, it only says that the penalty indorsement shall be put on the envelope, but it does not say that any violation of it shall subject, as in other cases, the party violating it to punishment.

Mr. CONGER. But the section of law which is amended, and which classes this matter among other matter under that section, does provide for a penalty, and that, I think, is sufficient.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, the section does; but in the way the bill is drawn I think it would be pretty evident in a criminal case, where strict construction, as the Senator knows, is the rule, that a person indicted or informed against for violating this new law could not be convicted, because all that the new law says in relation to the extension of the section is the granting part of it and what may be done under it. Then it provides that the envelopes shall have the penalty clause put on them. That is all right; but the bill ought to have, I submit with great respect, an additional clause, that any person violating this act shall be subject to the same penalties provided in the sections extended.

Mr. CONGER. But the very law amended—and this bill places this class in the midst of other classes in the law—has the provision providing punishment for the improper use of any official envelope. I think it is safe in that respect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only make the suggestion.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that the number of persons who would be endowed with the franking privilege under the bill would amount to about ten thousand. The number too is entirely in the discretion of the Chief Signal Officer. Of course if these envelopes should never be used for anything else except strictly official business probably no harm would grow out of the bill, but I call the attention of the vigilant Senator from Michigan to the fact that we are opening the doors so wide that it will be almost impossible ever to know whether the law is violated or not. I ask him whether it would not be better for the Government to take out of the Treasury a sum of money which would represent the actual postage expended and authorize the issuance of that in the discretion of the Signal Officer, and have the matter under our control, rather than give this franking privilege practically uncontrolled to eight thousand or ten thousand people over whom we have no control here except what is involved in the slight performance of a little casual service in connection with the transmission of weather reports. We should thus save ourselves from what is liable, I think, to become a great abuse. The money which the Government would pay, if it paid it directly, would, of course, be returned to it just as absolutely as by the use of this penalty envelope, and it would cost the Government no more to use a stamped envelope than to use a penalty envelope.

The general distribution of stationery itself is a thing liable to become a considerable abuse. A man who to-day makes these reports to-morrow ceases to make them, and somebody else takes his place. The man has got a lot of stationery which has been sent out for these purposes, and these penalty envelopes in addition, and they are sent to remote places in the country over which the office has no control, and inevitably they would be used. I understand that there is ground for suspicion, if not for absolute knowledge, that the provision which is now in existence, as limited and restricted as it is, is subject to very considerable abuse.

If we extend this privilege to persons scattered over the country in this way, it seems to me we might just about as well adopt the franking privilege and be done with it. Not so broadly as that perhaps, but at the same time it is the beginning of it. Why should not a person who writes about a bill on the Calendar have the franking privilege as well as the one who writes about the weather; and why should not one who writes about a claim which is pending in a Department, either from the Government standpoint or from his own standpoint, have the same privilege, and so on? It is much easier, I think the Senator from Michigan will agree, to enlarge a thing of this kind than to restrict it.

While I do not wish to object now to the consideration of the bill, it seems to me to be entering upon a very doubtful and experimental field of legislation.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Is this matter still open to objection? The Senator from Michigan said it would not occupy any time.

Mr. CONGER. It is not my fault.

Mr. FRYE. And here it is going to provoke discussion which may take all the forenoon.

Mr. CONGER. It will not occupy much time, if the Senator will allow me to make a remark, which I presume he will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. Scientific and careful observers all over the United States who send these reports for the benefit of the service and the benefit of the people receive no compensation. It is a voluntary act on their part, and the payment of the postage is a matter which should not be placed on them at their expense.

These envelopes will be sent only to a few persons in a State, and they will be used in the correspondence with the agent of the department in the State in sending messages to those voluntary assistants all over the State and returning for the use of the department all the information which is daily gathered all over this country.

I may say that without any question the early reports of storms and frosts and floods which have been made by these voluntary observers and have reached the Signal Office have been, in the saving of property and perhaps of life, to the value of millions of dollars a year. The observers who are actuated by a love of science and a desire to give this information should not be taxed with their postage in this matter. They perform these valuable services for the country and for the Government without any compensation whatever. There is no risk in the use of an official envelope in this case any more than in any other. These are not the kind of men who will use it for an improper purpose.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not question at all what the Senator said about the value of the transmission of weather reports, but if we have got to depend on the mails, especially the mails as they are carried in the portions of the country where those people are stationed, the weather would get there before the letter.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator need not worry about that. If the letter comes after the weather, this will not hurt anything.

Mr. PLUMB. No, but we shall have authorized the use of penalty envelopes for what is a very useless purpose.

Mr. CONGER. The people of the country do not think so.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know whether they do or not. The only information I have about it is a letter which I got from the Chief of the Signal Service Office. With that exception I have not heard the matter broached at all. While I do not doubt he believes it to be necessary, at the same time I should be glad to have the information from some outside sources, which would be, to my mind, a little more conclusive on this point. I do not believe that it is wise to thus extend the franking privilege. As the Senator says, if the letter does not get there until after the weather it will not do any hurt. Is that the only argument?

Mr. CONGER. I did not admit it, but I did not feel at liberty with the stalwart Senator to make an assertion contradicting it, because I am getting old and weak.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I will object to the bill, so that we may have time to look at it afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not open to objection. There was no reservation.

Mr. CONGER. The Senate has consented to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and I ask for a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan how many persons this franking privilege will apply to?

Mr. CONGER. I suppose it would apply on an average to from fifteen to twenty-five in a State.

Mr. ALLISON. The language of the bill is that it shall extend, "to all observers and agents co-operating with the Signal Service in collecting meteorological reports." There are nearly three hundred, certainly over two hundred, regular stations where there are paid observers of the United States to take these observations.

Mr. CONGER. They have this power now under the present law. That class of observers have the official envelopes now.

Mr. ALLISON. There are from three thousand to four thousand people in the various States of the Union and in various portions of our country who are what are called volunteer observers; that is, they receive no pay, but they collect statistics with reference to agricultural matters. If the bill is passed without some restriction this franking privilege, or whatever it may be called, will be extended to a vast number of people.

Mr. MILLER. The more the better.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is of doubtful utility, though I shall not antagonize the measure.

Mr. CONGER. All I desire to say is that for the benefit of the people more especially than any other thing these volunteer observers make observations, and the crops of the North and the cotton and sugar of the South have been saved by timely notice of approaching frosts and storms as well as a great many other subjects.

I care nothing about this measure more than any other Senator. If Senators do not want for their constituents to facilitate this matter by the mere printing of envelopes to be used in proper hands for sending out and returning this information, I do not want it. I do not care for it more than others.

Mr. MILLER. I think this is a very important matter, and I will say further that the measure is desired by all intelligent agriculturists of this country. The fear of the Senator from Iowa that it will lead to an abuse is not well founded. If there were five thousand or ten thousand of these volunteer observers in the country now, it would be to the advantage of the whole country. Wherever an intelligent citizen is willing to equip himself with proper instruments of observation and is regularly appointed by the bureau as a volunteer observer, certainly he should be permitted to send to the department a full report of his observations, and surely the Government can afford to do as much as to say that those observations may be sent in without the charge of postage. Otherwise the observer pays all his own expenses and gives his time. These observations, as I happen to know, in many parts of the country are very valuable not only in reporting changes of weather but for making more permanent observations and a more permanent study into the science of meteorology.

I feel that the Government can not aid this service in any way so well as by the passage of this bill. I have no fears of any great abuse ever arising under it. Certainly it is a matter which will always be under the control of Congress; it can repeal the measure; and it is under the control of the Chief of the Signal Service Bureau, who is held responsible for its operations.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think this bill is one of importance, particularly to the agricultural interests of this country. It has attracted the attention of scientists throughout the West, and it has so attracted the attention of the communities there that in several of the States by legislative authority State weather-service organizations have been established and the services of scientific men have been enlisted there. For instance, in my own State a weather service is regularly organized. An eminent professor of that State, Professor Payne, has been enlisted in behalf of the State, and all that is necessary for the Government to do to have the benefit of the observations and all the operations of the State service is to permit it to correspond in the way provided for in the bill. Now, I think it is of great benefit to the General Government and to the different parts of this country to have these reports in regard to the condition of the weather so that this intelligence can be spread abroad from the bureau here in Washington. I have no fear of the abuse of this privilege.

Mr. CALL. I would say that various applications have been made from the orange-growers in the State of Florida for additional stations and weather reports, and the result there has been highly favorable to the protection of the trees and vegetable growth, so as to have led to quite an extensive trade.

I think, whatever objection there may be to the details of this bill, it ought to pass, and if anything can be done by way of forwarding the sending of these reports the bill ought to pass. It is demanded by the interests of the country.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senate and House of Representatives renounced the franking privilege upon the apprehension that they could not trust themselves to transmit official correspondence through the mails without in some way violating the laws. In obedience to a great public demand manufactured by a Postmaster-General sending out printed petitions for the purpose of obtaining signatures Congress declared that franking was an abuse so far as they were concerned, and that matter to and from them ought not to go free through the mails. We are the only officials at this time who are denied the franking privilege. We trust everybody in this matter but ourselves.

There has been a gradual enlargement from time to time of the franking privilege, and I presume every member of Congress now receives from the Commissioner of Pensions and from other officers of the Government, in reply to communications that he forwards, envelopes addressed to his correspondent in answer to the letter that he has transmitted, in order that the communication of the department may be sent free of postage through the mails, upon the ground that the Senator or Member himself is an unfit person to write the name upon that envelope. We are willing to authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to send us an envelope addressed to our correspondent with a frank upon it, what is commonly called a penalty envelope, and we have declared that we are morally incapable of addressing an envelope of that kind ourselves, that we are morally unfit to be trusted, and if in one of those communications that we receive from the Commissioner of Pensions, written, I presume, by a clerk or a subordinate, we who have taken an oath to obey the Constitution and laws of the United States should insert a single word and reinclose that communication in that envelope we should be subject to a penalty of $300 for a violation of the postage laws of the United States.

Mr. President, this may be a self-respectful attitude for us to occupy. The only way for an official person to acquire the franking privilege is to cease in some way to be a member of Congress.

The number of people authorized in this bill to transmit letters free through the mails is variously estimated at from five to ten thousand. They are strictly private persons; they are unofficial persons. They are under no guarantee whatever for the appropriate discharge of their function. There is no bond; there is no official appointment or designation. It is a purely voluntary function. They may be appointed and they may be discharged; they may assume these duties and be relieved from them twice in every twenty-four hours. They discharge them just exactly as long as they please, and when they get done they quit; and yet the Senator from Michigan proposes to open this privilege to an unknown number of citizens, unofficial, without any responsibility whatever for the proper exercise of their function, for what? Let us read one provision of this bill:

And that all official mail matter relating to weather reports or containing warnings of the approach of storms, floods, frosts, or cold waves may be transmitted through the mail free of postage.

An observer of the weather in Manitoba, the far-distant regions of the north, where the blizzard finds its birthplace, may put in the mails to a citizen in New York an announcement that a storm is on its way from Manitoba and transmit that free of postage. And that is in the interest of science; it is demanded by all the agricultural interests of the country; as the Senator from Minnesota says, by congregations of scientists! A vast public interest has been developed to permit this voluntary observer who has agreed without compensation to forward the announcement of a cold wave somewhere in Washington Territory or—

Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound
Save his own dashings.

That observer could write a letter to General Hazen, the Chief Signal Officer, announcing to him that a cold wave has started from the Northwest, and that may be transmitted free of postage through the mail. And that is in the interest of science; that is demanded by all the agriculturists in this country; and the Senator thinks it would be a wise addition to the franking privilege to permit this great body of citizens thus employed to have the use of the mails without any restriction whatever except their own convictions or ideas of what is appropriate.

Mr. President, I will move to strike out after the word "reports," in line 10, down to and including the words "cold waves," in line 11, so as to confine this to official mail matter relating to weather reports, and to include the free service of the mails for warnings of the approach of storms, floods, frosts, or cold waves, which I suppose are transmitted by telegraph in order to be of any service to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Kansas if those officials have not now the right to use official envelopes?

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the officials have, that every official person connected with the Signal Service has the right now to transmit these communications free of postage through the mails.

Mr. BUTLER. Then why pass this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. This is intended to include that other vast corps of voluntary observers in different parts of the country to enable them to transmit these reports without the payment of postage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10, after the word "reports," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "waves," in line 11, as follows:

Or containing warnings of the approach of storms, floods, frosts, or cold waves.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the very pungent and eloquent speech of the Senator who has just taken his seat, as frequently happens, would apply just as well to any other bill as to the present, because it does not touch anything referred to in the present bill. In criticisms, which are made by supposing cases, by setting up a man of straw to fight and getting down on that man of straw with a vigorous effort, the Senator has achieved a great triumph. In this case he supposes that an observer would write to a private citizen in New York about a cold wave in Manitoba, and use official envelopes. There is no authority for any such thing. It is only weather reports from observers to the office, to the officials, not to any private person whatever, that this bill allows to be transmitted free of postage. So all the Senator's very eloquent speech, traversing half the continent, does not apply at all to this bill or to the subject-matter of it; and if his amendment prevails there is no use in passing the bill. You might as well take the vote direct on the question of passing the bill as to take it on the amendment, because those who would then be authorized by the bill to transmit the reports in these official envelopes are now authorized by law to do it.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate. The Senator from Maine is already angry with me for the prolongation of this debate. I ask for a vote on the amendment and on the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understand this bill, the real purpose of it is to send through the mails free of postage reports relating to the approach of storms, floods, frosts, and cold waves. That covers the whole ground intended to be covered by this bill. The rest of it is covered by existing statutes, I understand, so that every official person connected with the Signal Service has a right to use official envelopes for the transmission of reports relating to the duties of his office.

The Signal Service of the United States is established in the center here, radiating out to all the different points from coast to coast, and from mountain-top to valley, with various stations at which are supposed to be collected valuable data or statistics relating to the weather for two purposes, one of giving a prognostic of the weather, information in advance, and the other of furnishing certain data by which scientists can collect and arrange and compare facts together and possibly arrive at some general laws which regulate the direction of storms and their speed, and will indicate from what quarters they may be expected and at what times they may be expected to arrive.

So far as agriculture is concerned, notice of the approach of a cold wave or of a hot wave, and storm and rain, or a dry season, or of frost, snow, tornado, or cyclones, is not worth anything at all unless it can be sent by telegraph. If you rely upon the mail to collect data in reference to approaching storms, to approaching frosts, and approaching floods and cyclones, of course you will not get anything of any value at all.

This service is paid for at a very extravagant rate. I think it is the most expensive service in the Government of the United States, considering the profit or advantage that comes out of it, and I might say with reference to that that it is the most recklessly extravagant service in the United States. To supplement that service there are established about at different scientific institutions and by various scientific gentlemen who are called the agents and co-operating men of the Signal Service all through the States in every direction, and in some instances, as in the State of Alabama, there are local signal stations for the purpose of collecting the same data and at the same hours of the day that the signal officers at Washington and elsewhere throughout the country are expected to collect information about the state of the winds and the state of the weather.

I understand that the object of this bill is to give to each individual who may be connected with the Signal Service the right to frank all matter that he may choose to frank. We put him in an official relation to the Government by the mere fact that the Superintendent of the Signal Service recognizes him as an agent co-operating in getting data for that service. Let us see what it says:

That the provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act establishing post-roads, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail-matter, be, and is hereby, extended to all observers and agents co-operating with the Signal Service in collecting meteorological reports for the benefit of commerce and agriculture.

There is a privilege of franking conferred upon a class. If such a man writes a letter or places an inclosure in an envelope, seals it, and marks it "official business," it makes no difference what it may relate to, he has the right to send it through the mail; he has the franking privilege conferred upon him by this law under the administration and with the assent only of the Chief of the Signal Service.

My observation has been a pretty accurate one upon this subject, because I happen to be on a commission charged with an investigation and examination of this subject, and I warn the Senate that it will not do in the present organization of the Signal Service to confer upon the head of that service any more power than he possesses. If the object of this bill—and I can not conceive in my own apprehension that that is the object of it—if one object of this bill, I will say, is to confer upon the Chief of the Signal Service the right to endow with the franking privilege any person that he may choose to associate with that service by an arrangement or by an appointment as an agent connected with the collection of statistics, that will be a dangerous power to everybody in the United States except the Chief of the Signal Service. To him it will be a very valuable adjunct or assistance in building up and putting props under that system which already has been propped extensively and unjustly at the expense of the people of the United States. Never was there a service in this country which has grown so rapidly; never was there a service in this country which has grown more by special personal influence, brought to bear for the express purpose of building it up.

I do not propose by my vote to enlarge the powers or privileges of the Chief of the Signal Service. Let the Senate wait till it hears a report from that commission. The evidence taken has already been printed and only awaits, I think, the action of the chairman to be brought into the Senate. Wait until you see that report and see what the people of the United States have testified in respect to this matter, including Secretaries of War and the generals commanding armies, and many, very many other persons in public and in private life, before you commence to increase the powers of this Signal Officer. It is a dangerous movement, and it is one, as it looks to me, that must have been in some sense intended to anticipate what might be the action of the Senate upon a very important matter that was committed to a joint commission by the action of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, I do not think that it is wise or prudent, in this indirect way, just now, to furbish up and polish up the Signal Service by an act of Congress before this commission can have a chance to bring the facts to the attention of the Senate and the House that they have been required to gather, and which they have been very assiduous in trying to collect.

Above all things, I do not wish to see it put in the power of one man at the head of the Signal Service of the United States to create a large class of persons at his own option who may have the unlimited privilege of exercising the franking power. That is the point in the case. That, in connection with the one I suggested when I first rose, is sufficient to indicate what my vote must necessarily be upon this bill. There is not much use for a Signal Service report by mail one hundred miles!

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. I secured unanimous consent to take up this bill on the assurance which I then entertained and made to the Senator from Maine that it would not probably occupy much time in discussion. The views of Senators in regard to it show that they wish to discuss it more, and if the Senator from Alabama will yield, in order to keep as far as I can my pledge to the Senator from Maine that it should not interfere with his time, I ask leave to withdraw the motion to consider the bill, and I shall ask the Senate at an early day to take it up when there is more leisure.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion being withdrawn——

Mr. MILLER. Can the motion be withdrawn except by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having by a vote taken up the bill, it is subject to the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I asked unanimous consent. I will discuss this when we have more time and when it will not infringe on what I admit to be the prior right of the Senator from Maine, who had unanimous consent yesterday to call up his resolution to-day.

Mr. MILLER. I am not going to object, but I want some understanding as to the time when the Senator from Michigan will call this measure up. I am very much interested in it, and if he will call it up to-morrow or Monday or any fixed time so that I may have notice of it and be here, I shall not object.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to take it up whenever the Senate is willing to consider this matter. I withdraw it now with the understanding that we shall at an early day when there is more leisure for the discussion of this bill, and when it will not interfere with other business, call it up and ask the Senate to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the pending bill being laid aside? The Chair hears none.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of March 30, 1886, a report upon the claims of certain Indians for compensation for lands; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], from the Committee on Foreign Relations February 3, 1886, is now before the Senate. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two governments on the coasts of the United States and British North America, ought not to be provided for by Congress.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I propose to submit a few practical suggestions touching the question of the fisheries. It is a matter of very profound interest in the country now, and that interest will increase rather than diminish, I greatly fear. I feel justified in making rather a common-place speech for the information which I hope it may contain, which may be of use in various discussions about this subject.

The President of the United States, in his annual message, says:

I recommend that the Congress provide for the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be respectively represented, charged with the consideration and settlement, upon a just, equitable, and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two governments and their respective citizens on the coasts of the United States and British North America.

And this brings Congress to the consideration of a question of the greatest importance, not only to our fishermen but to the nation. I confess that I feel a profound interest in its determination, for the State I in part represent will be largely affected by it for good or for ill. By the last census the interests of the State of Maine in the sea fisheries are second only to those of Massachusetts. Permit me to give the statistics:

Persons employed	11,071
Vessels employed	606
Tonnage of same	17,632.65
Fishing boats	5,920
Capital dependent on the fishery industries	$3,375,994
Pounds of sea products as they come from the water	202,048,449
Value of sea products as they come from the water	$1,790,849
Pounds of sea products after being prepared for the market	116,122,048
Enhancement of value in process of preparation	$1,823,329
Value of sea products in marketable condition	$3,614,178

But, sir, this industry is not confined to my State, nor to New England as is frequently asserted. It extends down the whole Atlantic coast into the Gulf of Mexico, up the Pacific coast into the Alaskan waters, and along the great lakes. It is, too, an industry susceptible of an enormous growth. Freezing processes, refrigerators on vessels and cars; railroads touching 2,290 counties of our forty-four States and Territories, affording facilities for the safe transportation of fresh fish thousands of miles into the interior, and enabling the market-men to sell in the remotest cities for prices less than are paid for beef, or mutton, or pork, make the United States the best market in the world for the products of the sea and the lake. Unobstructed, without bounty or subsidy, or special privileges, secured against the aggressions of treaties with England, there is no reason why our fishing fleet shall not in ten years number 15,000 vessels, manned by 200,000 of the hardiest, most skilled, and bravest sailors in the world—sailors who, at the bugle-call of the Republic, will promptly respond and make us invincible on the ocean. And yet, notwithstanding the marvelous increase in the demand for the products of the fisheries, we are compelled to witness a phenomenal increase in the fishing fleet and men of the Dominion of Canada and a mortifying decrease in our own. At the opening of the struggle for our independence we had in the New England fleet alone 665 vessels—about one-third as many as now—while the consumption of fish in the country is twenty times greater than then. Why, sir, during the last ten years the fishing fleet of Massachusetts has fallen off 270 vessels, or 29 per cent., while Maine has lost even a larger proportion—70 vessels in 1884 alone. The census of 1880 shows as follows:

The number of persons employed in the fishery industries of the United States was 131,426, of whom 101,684 were fishermen, and the remainder shoresmen. The fishing fleet consisted of 6,605 vessels (with a tonnage of 208,297.82) and 44,804 boats, and the total amount of capital invested was $37,955,349, distributed as follows: Vessels, $9,357,282; boats, $2,465,393; minor apparatus and outfits, $8,145,261; other capital, including shore property, $17,987,413.

The value of the fisheries of the sea, the great rivers and the great lakes, was placed at $43,046,053, and that of those in minor inland waters at $1,500,000; in all, $44,546,053.

The fisheries of the New England States are the most important. They engage 37,043 men, 2,066 vessels, 14,787 boats, and yield products to the value of $14,270,393.

Next to New England in importance are the South Atlantic States, employing 52,418 men, 3,014 vessels (the majority of which are small, and engaged in the shore and bay fisheries), 13,331 boats, and returning products to the value of $9,602,737.

Next are the Middle States, employing in the coast fisheries 14,981 men, 1,210 vessels, 8,293 boats, with products to the amount of $8,676,579.

Next are the Pacific States and Territories, with 16,803 men, 56 vessels, 5,547 boats, and products to the amount of $7,484,750. The fisheries of the great lakes employ 5,050 men, 62 vessels, and 1,594 boats, with products to the amount of $1,784,050. The Gulf States employ 5,131 men, 197 vessels, and 1,252 boats, yielding products to the value of $545,584.

Mr. President, is this an industry that should be recklessly destroyed? From the day Peter said "I go a fishing" to now it has been regarded by every country, at any period of time, powerful on the seas, absolutely indispensable, not only to protect the rights of fishermen but to foster and encourage their industry in every possible way. No nation has ever, in all history, become commercially important whose success can not be clearly traced to the encouragement afforded its fisheries. In 1563 England, by an act of Parliament, provided—

That as well for the maintenance of shipping, the increase of fishermen and mariners, &c., it shall not be lawful to eat meat on Wednesdays and Saturdays unless under the forfeiture of £2 for each offense.

This act, with the rules of the then prevailing Church, dedicated three days in each week to the benefit of the fishermen. Again, I assert, and history will justify me in it, that every nation in the past which has permitted her fisheries to decline through neglect, or has destroyed them by adverse legislation, has lost its prestige and rapidly declined in power and influence. This nation recognized these facts of history, took to heart the lessons taught, and in its very infancy, in poverty and weakness, enacted bounty laws for the encouragement of our fisheries. In 1819 they were revised and still more valuable advantages were conferred. Why then is it that this industry seems now to have caught on to our fast disappearing foreign carrying trade? There is nothing occult about the problem, and no alchemist is needed for its solution.

A brief review of our negotiations with Great Britain reveals the true cause. As her colony, we had for our fishermen the use of the seas and fished wherever we pleased. There was no limitation whatever upon our right; and in 1783, after the war was over, we made our first treaty with Great Britain. John Adams, the persistent, determined friend of the fishing interests of the United States, was one of the commission, and we owe that treaty very largely to him. I call the attention of the Senate to its terms:

ARTICLE III.

It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Banks and on all other banks of New Foundland, also in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish.

To be sure, England's assumption is apparent even here in her concession to us of the right to fish on the "Banks." Why, these conceded fishing-grounds are from thirty to two hundred miles from the coast line of her possessions.

What magnanimity! It is characteristic of England to deal generously with rights and privileges not hers, but she never yields one jot or one tittle really belonging to her without the most extravagant compensation, and in her ceaseless quest for trade, in her tireless endeavor to extend her commerce, to build up her manufactures, she indulges in no sentiment, wastes no liberality. For half a century she stood on a lofty moral plane, and missed no opportunity to taunt us as the defenders of slavery; but the moment the dissolution of the Republic seemed possible she became active and zealous to make it certain, though she knew if success crowned her efforts slavery would be forever perpetuated in one-half of our divided country. She thought she knew too that her commercial power would be equally perpetuated there. This unscrupulous purpose to aggrandize her power regardless of the rights of others brought on the war of 1812, and after its close impelled her to make the declaration that we, by reason of the war, had forfeited all the rights in the fisheries we ever had as her colony or had acquired under the terms of the treaty of 1783. Our commissioners stoutly resisted this claim and threatened to discontinue all negotiations if this declaration was persisted in. The result was entire silence as to fishery rights in the treaty of 1814.

I call attention now, Mr. President, to the treaty of 1818, the provisions of which, I suppose, have been in force since the abrogation of the fishery clauses of the "treaty of Washington." In the negotiation of this England evinced neither magnanimity nor sentiment, and our commissioners neither sagacity nor courage. The times were not propitious for us. Waterloo had been fought; the allies had entered Paris; Napoleon had abdicated, and England was arrogant. We deliberately surrendered all of our fishery rights, and a blow was dealt that industry from which it has never recovered. By its terms England laid the foundation for ceaseless demands, and invited her colonies to the enactment of penal laws and the commission of outrages in their name which would disgrace any civilization.

I call attention to Article I: "and the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within the above-mentioned limits," with a proviso that our fishermen might enter these bays, &c., for shelter or to repair damage, to purchase wood and take water, but for no other purpose whatever. We reserved to ourselves only the commonest rights of hospitality and renounced all commercial privileges whatsoever. But, to be accurate, I ought not to say "renounced all commercial privileges," for up to that time, under England's peculiar colonial policy, we had enjoyed no such privileges.

Mr. COKE. May I ask the Senator who were the American commissioners in the negotiation of the treaty of 1818?

Mr. FRYE. I did know, but I have forgotten who they were.

In 1819 the English Parliament passed an act construing this article, making it an offense if our vessels had fished, were then fishing, or preparing to fish, within the shore line, and the colonial courts held that when a vessel within the shore line was preparing to fish outside of it she was liable to seizure and condemnation.

Further, England claimed that this three-mile line was to be measured outside of a line drawn from headland to headland, which would include gulfs half as large as the Gulf of Mexico. It is true that on the protest of our Government she subsequently instructed her officers not to enforce the law under this claim, but she has never renounced it. For several years we had but little trouble under this treaty; then it came in a perfect avalanche. England and her colony coveted our increasing market, and as usual, without a scruple, went for it. They seized vessel after vessel, condemned them in colonial courts on the testimony of colonial witnesses, refused them shelter, drove them to sea in storms, seized and searched on the high seas, broke up voyages, until, in fact, the perils of the sea on the banks were not greater than the dangers of the law within the shore line. Our Government interfered again and again. Mr. Van Buren sent the Grampus into those waters in 1839; Mr. Pierce ordered a fleet there; the Kearsarge and the Mississippi cruised there, and in the presence of our armed vessels our fishermen were undisturbed, but immediately on their withdrawal the outrages were renewed.

The records of the Halifax commission are full of evidences of illegal seizures; of seizures and condemnations on complaints of the most trivial and inconsequential character; of every conceivable outrage and wrong; of every violation of the rights of hospitality and friendly intercourse. In the pursuit of these unjustifiable methods England and her colony had but one purpose—to force open our markets, and in 1854 their efforts were crowned with success in the ratification of the so-called "reciprocity treaty," reciprocal, however, largely only in name. They opened their fisheries to us, and we our markets to them. I am confining myself, Mr. President, strictly to the question in issue, and, therefore, do not discuss the other features of that treaty. Its effects upon our fisheries are indicated clearly and unmistakably by the statistics of this industry. In 1854 we had employed in this industry a tonnage of 470,000. In 1867, when the treaty was abrogated, our tonnage was 165,000. By reason of a change in the method of measurement, this last amount should be increased to 250,000, or thereabouts, to make a fair comparison. It must be borne in mind that during the whole life of this treaty we were paying a bounty of $4 a ton to our fishermen.

At the earliest possible moment, under its terms, we gave the required notice for the abrogation of this treaty, and I believe there was found no man in Congress poor enough to do it reverence. Immediately following this abrogation, Canada resorted to the license system, imposing upon our fishermen the first year a tonnage tax of 50 cents a ton for the privilege of fishing in their waters; the second year, $1; the third, $2; and our fishermen declined to avail themselves of the dearly purchased privilege. This experiment proving a failure, she promptly resorted to the old and hitherto successful tactics of outrage, seizure, condemnation, and denial of commercial rights, until the patience of our Government was exhausted, and Congress indicated, by its reception of "a memorial of the fishermen of the United States," that retaliatory legislation was imminent, when, unfortunately for our interests, we threw ourselves once more beneath the triumphant wheels of Great Britain's diplomatic chariot and ratified the "treaty of Washington" in 1871.

Under its terms a commission was to be appointed—for what? To settle the fishery rights as between the United States and the colonies of Great Britain, precisely what the President of the United States recommends in his message to us to do. The commission was appointed. It was made up of the brightest man in all Canada, a man too old to be bright or efficient on the part of the United States, and a mere dependent on Great Britain for the third one. What was the result?

Under the terms of that treaty, and by the finding of a commission, we secured the right to fish within the shore line of Canada, the right of "wood, water, and shelter," of drying fish, under limitations. We paid for these worthless rights and privileges $5,500,000, and gave Canada once more our market. We remitted, during the life of the treaty, in duties nearly $6,000,000, as the annexed table shows:

Table showing the value of dutiable fish admitted free of duty under the reciprocity treaty with the Dominion of Canada and the estimated amount of duties remitted for the years ending June 30, 1874, to 1885, inclusive.

How do they estimate the value of our market? There was recently published "special correspondence of the Boston Post," dated St. John, New Brunswick, January 5, 1886, containing interviews with leading men engaged in the fisheries. George L. Young, who controls the finnan haddie manufacture, says:

In other words, the heaviest parts of our fishing business will have to go down unless we can obtain a treaty of some kind so that we can use the American markets without having to pay duties on our fish.

A treaty is very much more necessary to our fishing interests now than when the Washington treaty was entered into, for the reason that other markets are very much poorer and we have much more fish to sell. Look for a moment and see how our fisheries prospered under the late treaty. First, we will take the islands in the Bay of Fundy—Briar Island, Grand Manan, Campobello, and Deer Island—where the inhabitants are dependent entirely upon fishing for a livelihood. Before the treaty (not including a slight advancement during the American rebellion) they were for years about holding their own, making a living and nothing more, when they had all the advantages of a good West India market for the small amount of fish caught. During the existence of the treaty, although the population has not greatly increased, the wealth of the four islands has more than doubled. As for Nova Scotia, they could hardly count one good banker, while to-day they have as fine a fleet and nearly as many as the United States, and have commenced to build a few seiners. The treaty built those industries up, which will have to tumble down unless another of a similar kind is made.

Messrs. Barbour Brothers, a firm which handles a large quantity of fish. Said the head of the firm:

The present fishery arrangement between Canada and the United States is altogether a one-sided affair from which the United States fisherman reap all the benefit. True it is only temporary, and it is well for Canada that is so, as a lengthened continuation of it would either starve our fishermen or drive them into rebellion. The provincial fishermen are deeply agitated over the present state of affairs, and well they might be, for it strikes right home to their pockets. By the present condition of things the business is practically taken out of the hands of our fisherman, and American bottoms are doing what ought to be done by provincial vessels. If this condition of things continues it will not be difficult to see the result. Either our fishermen will have to change their vocation or starve or emigrate. Quite a number of fishermen belonging to down the bay have already taken the oath of allegiance to the United States. We do not feel the effects of the present arrangement so much in St. John as do the fishermen of Grand Manan, Letete, Deer Island, St. Andrews, and other places down the bay. Their only market is the United States, and they are very much handicapped by the heavy duty and the excessive entrance fees demanded of them. With regard to the export of fish from this province to the United States, I am quite safe in saying that since the fishery clause of the treaty expired it has decreased fully one-third.

Enoch B. Colwell, another large dealer, says:

In my opinion we should have a renewal of the Washington treaty, as it would be of more advantage to Canada to have the treaty and be able to send her fish into the United States markets duty free than to put cutters on to drive the Americans out of our waters. I have not felt any serious effect from the expiration of the treaty so far, as sufficient had been shipped for home consumption before the treaty expired, and what we send in now to the United States is placed in bond. Next season, unless the treaty is renewed or some similar arrangement made, we will feel the effects of it very much. In 1884 I handled a large quantity of fish for smoking purposes. In 1885 I didn't touch a single barrel, as I couldn't do it and compete with the Eastport people. Believe me, what is wanted is a renewal of the treaty. Our fishermen are a unit in favor of it, as it is a market for their fish they want.

Mr. J. V. Ellis, a journalist of considerable experience and ability, who also represents the city of St. John in the New Brunswick legislature, and is a member of the St. John board of trade, was asked for his views on the fishery question:

"What will be the effect on us if we do not get some concession?"

"I do not care to go into that. If I was a member of the Canadian government for one of these maritime provinces I would get some concession and consideration from the United States for what we can give them. It only requires earnestness and determination. But I have no faith in the desire of the present government to pursue this business. On this you may depend—these maritime provinces must have a very large measure of reciprocal trade with the United States, and they will have it some way or other before long or——"

"What will happen?"

"Oh, well—the deluge."

Why, Mr. President, the report of the commissioner of marine and fisheries for the Dominion shows that Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and Quebec had in 1882 786 vessels, 6,486 men; 11,225 boats, with 23,446 men—an increase of at least two-thirds under the influence of a free United States market.

The Dominion had in 1873 402 vessels and 9,009 boats in the fishery business; in 1884, 902 vessels and 12,772 boats; a gain of 500 vessels and 3,163 boats, and of men employed at least 15,000. The province of Nova Scotia in a single year, 1883, added 143 schooners, chiefly bankers, to her fleet, affording employment, as her fishery inspector, Mr. Rogers, says, to 1,526 more sailors.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information, if he will yield to me.

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator perhaps knows more about the subject than any other member of the body, and therefore I propose an inquiry to him. I heard a remark fall from his lips that so and so might be done but for the aggressions of the treaty-making power. I should like to know whether he thinks it possible for these rights to be affected without some negotiation in reference to the subject-matter?

Mr. FRYE. Beyond any manner of question this country should put herself into a decent position in regard to these matters. If this country permits Great Britain and Canada by outrages, by violations of all the rights of hospitality, to drive us into the surrender of our market, we never can have peace with Canada; but if Canada understands when she closes her ports, as she is undertaking to do to-day, that the ports of the United States are to be closed against her, you will then have no difficulty and no trouble with Canada.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask him what the particular outrages are to which he refers since the termination of the provisional agreement?

Mr. FRYE. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to know what the particular outrages are to which he refers on the part of Canada which would demand, as they ought to demand if they are outrages, the attention of the American people.

Mr. FRYE. That would be quite a statement to require of me. I will name one: The commissioner of marine of Canada has issued a proclamation in which he denies the right of an American fisherman to buy bait or ice in a Canadian port.

Mr. GRAY. We are all, I suppose, desirous of maintaining the rights of all the people of this country. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to a paragraph that I find in the New York Tribune, a paper from which he read the other day in regard to that very matter, which tends to show that, so far as the American Government is concerned and its diplomatic and consular agents, the rights of Americans are not being neglected? If it is not interrupting the Senator I should like to have about ten lines of this article read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GRAY. The extract is from the same paper from which the Senator from Maine read the other day. Not the same issue, but the same newspaper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

FISHING IN DOMINION WATERS—ADMIRAL SCOTT'S MISTAKEN NOTIONS—THE UNITED STATES CONSUL-GENERAL INSTRUCTS HIM REGARDING HIS DUTIES.

[Special.]

HALIFAX, April 7.

There was an interesting gathering of lawyers and legislators in the parliamentary library to-day when United States Consul-General Phelan and Admiral Scott met, the latter undertaking to show the American representative under what authority he had ordered American fishing vessels out of provincial waters. The various local statutes were carefully searched by Admiral Scott without finding any warrants justifying his proceedings. Then the good-natured admiral in his bluff English way declared that "some duffer had knocked that section out of the statute-book." He fell back upon an old act of George III which he alleged gave him requisite authority. The consul-general contended that that act was obsolete and was repealed by the British North American act, which gave exclusive control of the fisheries to the Canadian parliament. Admiral Scott then agreed to telegraph the points raised by Consul Phelan to the Dominion government and await instructions. Therefore the flagship Lansdowne will be idle for some time. Consul-General Phelan contends that American vessels can put into any Canadian port and stay a month if they want to, and the only thing the Canadians can do is to put an officer on board to see that she does not fish or buy bait. It is understood that the result of this little conference will also be telegraphed to Washington. Meanwhile it appears that affairs will remain in statu quo, as Captain Scott will only hereafter act within the strict letter and spirit of his instructions.

Mr. GRAY. I thank the Senator for allowing me to call his attention to that, because it seemed to me it was apropos to something he said about executive aggression interfering with the rights of the American fishermen.

Mr. FRYE. I referred, Mr. President, to the aggression of the treaty-making power. I was glad to notice in the Tribune that our consul-general at Halifax seemed to have been better informed than our Secretary of State at Washington.

Mr. GRAY. He seems to have taken the same view precisely as the Secretary of State, so far as anything I have seen from him is concerned.

Mr. FRYE. Did not the Senator notice the two dispatches, one sent in the morning and the other in the evening, which I read the other day?

Mr. GRAY. I did. I will not interrupt the Senator now to say what I think about those dispatches; but I think they are entirely consistent with the position taken by Consul-General Phelan.

Mr. FRYE. The worst outrage which they can commit is the very one which they contend there they have a right to commit, and that is to prevent our vessels from buying bait and ice. What other commercial privileges, let me ask the Senator from Delaware, do we want of Canada than to let our vessels buy bait and ice there? There is nothing else on earth we want to buy there.

Mr. GRAY. I was not talking about commercial privileges. I was talking about the activity of the consular agents.

Mr. FRYE. The consular agent seems to admit there that we can not buy bait and ice.

Mr. GRAY. He has not said anything about that, I think.

Mr. FRYE. That very statement made in the New York Tribune says so, that the Canadians can put men on board our vessels, if they stay there a month, and put them there to see to what? To see that we do not fish or buy bait. All on earth we want to buy there is bait and ice.

Now what did we gain by the treaty of 1871?

Mr. GIBSON. I should like the Senator to point out any clause in the treaty by which the rights of our fishermen to buy bait may be enforced in the Dominion.

Mr. FRYE. It is impossible for me to point out any commercial privilege given or yielded in a treaty between us and Great Britain. We never had any commercial privileges mentioned in such treaties.

Mr. GIBSON. Did we ever relinquish the right, assuming that there was a right, to buy bait or anything else?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; I contend and shall contend that we have an undoubted right to buy bait and ice there, just as much as they have to buy bait and ice in our ports—to buy anything that we wish to buy.

Observe the increase of Canada's exports of fish to this country since 1871:

1871	$84,742 59
1872	244,856 09
1873	252,650 13
1874	1,939,850 66
1875	2,315,144 65
1876	1,832,298 68
1877	1,435,694 76
1878	2,206,445 32
1879	1,825,036 89
1880	1,885,841 25
1881	2,559,312 52
1882	2,632,952 65
1883	3,324,832 85
1884	3,886,358 39

I have not the official figures of the great lake fisheries, but am informed that they fairly participate in this gain. In fact, it is beyond dispute that the life of the Canadian fisheries depends largely upon the freedom of our markets. Now, sir, what advantages have accrued to us from the Washington treaty?

1. "Wood, water, and shelter." But we had those before, and now too, under the treaty of 1818.

2. Of commercial privileges. None, under the treaty.

3. The right to take fish within the three-mile limit. What has this been worth to us? The right to take caplin and squid for bait would have been of value, but the moment we undertook to avail ourselves of it we found cables cut, nets destroyed, all manner of damage inflicted, and nothing else could have been expected. The people around those shores, living on the small bays and harbors, have only one resource upon which they can depend for money, the capture of caplin and squid for bait, to be sold to the fishermen. Men, women, and children engage in it with the hook and line. One of our vessels with its huge seine can sweep a little bay clean. Who can blame these people for defending to the bitter end their only source of supply, the sole barrier between them and starvation? Our fishermen speedily gave up this advantage under the treaty and have purchased their bait of these poor people at a cost of over $100,000 annually. The shore and gulf fisheries have been absolutely worthless.

Carefully compiled statistics for the whole period of twelve years show an annual average of 96⅝ vessels engaged in the gulf fisheries and within the shore line. The average annual catch in the gulf was worth in our market $194,659; within the shore line, $64,882. That would give each vessel in the gulf, $2,010; in the shore line, $673. Now, an American vessel in the gulf, to pay expenses of outfit, insurance, depreciation of vessel, crew's share, and master's commission, must take four thousand dollars' worth of mackerel. So, that every mackerel taken either in the gulf or in the shore line actually cost nearly twice what it was worth. During the whole twelve years our vessels took about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth, and they cost them more than $1,200,000. The statistics of the last half of the treaty period make a still worse showing. Formerly it was not unusual for us to have 500 mackerel vessels at a time in the gulf, but in 1879 we had 44; in 1880, 34; in 1881, 3; in 1882, 1.

W. A. Wilcox, of the United States Fish Commission, in his report for 1885, says:

The few vessels that fished in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence at times found mackerel very scarce, at times very plenty, but they were small, and of poor quality. With the hopes of finding larger and better fish soon, the vessels in many cases forwarded their catch by rail or steamer to Boston or Gloucester, the same selling for $2.12½ to $3.50 per barrel, frequently not bringing enough to pay the cost of barrels, salt, freight, insurance, and commission, not mentioning time, labor, and expense of the voyage. The crews fishing on shares in many cases received nothing, and the vessels' expenses exceeded their gross receipts.

* * * * * * *

On November 21 schooners Spencer F. Baird, Wm. McDonald, and W. H. Jordan arrived at Gloucester from a six weeks' cruise in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence and off the Nova Scotia shore, none of these vessels having caught a single mackerel during the entire trip.

Vessels from Gloucester, Mass., are the only ones that entered provincial ports for the purpose of obtaining barrels and supplies. These purchased 9,572 empty fish-barrels, valued at $7,425.95, and paid in addition $9,759.05 for provisions, and $331.26 harbor dues.

It needs no argument outside of these figures to show that the right accorded us to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and within the three-mile shore line is absolutely worthless.

Mr. MORGAN. Is not the right to fish with bait worth something?

Mr. FRYE. Within the shore line?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it is not. How are you going to take your halibut?

Mr. MORGAN. I refer especially to mackerel.

Mr. FRYE. Mackerel fishing there I think is practically worthless to us; but halibut fish can be taken with bait. We wish to buy bait in Canada for that.

Mr. President, why is it that a privilege formerly of immense value has become valueless? Simply for the reason that there has been a radical change in the manner and methods of fishing, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama.

I am speaking now of mackerel fishing, for that is the only one we have ever pursued in these Canadian waters. The cod, haddock, and halibut fishing is conducted in waters Great Britain, fortunately for us, does not own. Formerly we took our mackerel with hook and line, but the introduction of the great purse-seine and the machinery by which it is set has changed this and transferred our mackerel fishery from those Canadian waters to our own. By its use the same number of men can capture five times as many fish; can commence taking them off Hatteras and continue up to the coast of Maine; can use the seine safely in the deep waters, but with difficulty and danger within shore lines and in the gulfs. This immense mackerel fleet, following relentlessly the fish for a thousand miles, giving them no rest or peace night or day, has prevented them from seeking the shores in any great numbers, and the shore fisheries have become comparatively useless except for small boats. I do not feel entirely certain but that Great Britain, should we foolishly provide for another commission, will present a claim for damages resulting to the shore and gulf fisheries in the Canadian waters from our new methods of fishing, nor absolutely sure that the commissioners would not allow $5,500,000. There would be as good reason for such allowance as there was before.

The entire worthlessnesss to us of the privileges accorded by the Washington treaty, the gradual but certain destruction of our fishing industry, the alarming decrease of our fishing fleet and of the sailors manning it, were known of all men, and the earliest day it could, under the terms of the treaty, be done, I introduced a resolution into the Senate instructing the President to give notice of its abrogation as to the fishing clauses. The resolution was reported back from the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously, and passed both Houses of Congress without dissent or division. July 1, 1885, should have released us from this bondage, but months before that long-desired day arrived our fishermen heard with amazement and indignation that Secretary Bayard was making, without the interposition of the Senate, a new treaty, extending certain provisions of the old one, with a new agreement that—

The President will bring the whole question of the fisheries before Congress at its next session in December, and recommend the appointment of a joint commission by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain to consider the matter, in the interest of maintaining good neighborhood and friendly intercourse between the two countries, thus affording a prospect of negotiation for the development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to attack the honorable Secretary. My resolution, as I introduced it, made no reference to him nor to his agreement. Whether or not he exceeded his authority is immaterial to my purpose. I cheerfully accord to him an honest desire to do that which seemed to him to be for the good of the fishermen and the peace of the Republic. I have no doubt that Sir Ambrose Shea and Mr. West, the British minister, persuaded the Secretary that the Gulf of St. Lawrence was a great and profitable fishing resort for our fleet; that very likely Canada would enforce her penal laws as she had before; that our adventures would be broken up; that even the peace of nations might be disturbed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause a moment. The hour of 2 having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. Ordinary courtesy requires that the Senator from Maine should have the opportunity to conclude his remarks, and I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside informally for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that course will be taken and the resolution of the Senator from Maine will be continued before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Connecticut propose to extend the same privilege to other Senators who may desire to debate the resolution?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to go on with the Washington bill after the Senator from Maine concludes his speech. I think we can get it out of the way quickly.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the fault of the Secretary of State was that he should take counsel only of the enemy; that he should not have consulted Mr. George Steele, president of the American Fishery Union, who wrote him under date of April 28, 1885, that "the officers of the Fishery Union desire to present the interests of their pursuits in this emergency to the attention of yourself personally or to the President;" that he should have replied to him under date of May 2, 1885—

The interests which your association represents have, as you can now see, already received, and shall continue to receive, the most earnest and abundant consideration on the part of the President and of this Department; and, knowing this, you will probably see little need for incurring the inconvenience of sending just now a personal delegation to Washington to present your views.

If this hearing had been reasonably granted, neither the President nor Mr. Bayard would have fallen into the diplomatic traps Mr. West set for them. The President in his annual message complied with that article of Mr. Bayard's treaty which provided for a recommendation of a new commission.

Mr. MORGAN. As there will be no opportunity to-day to make any reply to the Senator from Maine——

Mr. FRYE. I think there will.

Mr. MORGAN. It is proper that during his remarks it should be stated that the Secretary of State was very earnestly importuned by important men and important interests to make some regulation or some arrangement that would prevent any collision between the two governments with regard to this fisheries matter and would protect the fleet of fishermen then in the waters of the British possessions. I have not thought that it was necessary to obtain from the Secretary of State the communications that were made to him, but I have been assured by him personally that they were very urgent and very numerous. It was the last of his expectations that any outcry would come from that section of the country against an honest effort on the part of the administration to protect the fishermen in that quarter against any violent collision or apparent irruption on their fishing rights and privileges in the midst of the fishing season.

The Senator from Maine certainly does not wish to do the administration or the Secretary of State any injustice, and I assure him that the Secretary of State will be able to satisfy him that the importunities from that section of country were, as I have stated, from very important men and were very urgently made.

Mr. FRYE. I thought that I accorded to the Secretary of State entire honesty of purpose in this matter. I complained that he did not give a hearing to the president of the Fishery Union. If he had, neither the President nor the Secretary of State would have fallen into this diplomatic trap which had been set for them here in Washington.

Now, Mr. President, who seeks another commission? In the light of the history I have sketched, of treaties with Great Britain touching our fishing interests, of the awards and judgments of commissioners having hitherto the consideration and settlement of differences between us and our Canadian neighbors, is there a single ray of encouragement for us to enter again upon this dangerous pathway? What have we to gain by it?

I declare that no man in the United States has asked for another commission, and that no man's name in the United States can be given who has sought another commission at the hands of the President or Secretary of State.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine what he means by another commission? Does he mean a commission like that which met at Halifax, or a commission like that which negotiated and settled the treaty of 1871?

Mr. FRYE. I mean precisely what the President says—a commission to consider and settle the fishery rights. I mean any commission.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me ask the Senator from Maine, so that we may understand each other, does he hold that it is the duty of the Government from this time forward to abstain from all effort to settle any disputed questions that may arise or have arisen on the construction of the treaties or the effect of the provincial or British laws upon this subject of the fisheries? Does he intend to close the door against all future negotiations and leave the matter standing precisely as it is, without any effort on the part of the Government of the United States either to correct it or to participate in bringing the two governments to a common understanding as to what the rights of our people are?

Mr. FRYE. I have no power, and if I had I do not know that I would exercise it, to prevent negotiations being made for a treaty touching Canada and her trade and our trade through the usual and ordinary channels, where it would take a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate to ratify any treaty so made.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, I concur with the Senator from Maine that whatever questions remain unsettled between these two governments ought to be settled in the ordinary channels of diplomacy, and ought to be settled ultimately by a two-thirds vote of the Senate upon a treaty submitted to them. I agree to that; but I do not think that it is exactly fair to characterize the suggestion of the President that we should act through a commission as being one entirely parallel with or at all akin to that unfortunate misadventure of our commission which settled the Halifax difficulty in a manner so extremely distasteful to us. I do not understand the President in his recommendation to propose a commission which shall by its action in advance conclude all questions between the governments as to the fisheries, but that it is to negotiate; and I concur with the Senator from Maine that the proper functionaries of the United States Government to negotiate treaties are specified in the Constitution of the country, and they are the diplomatic agents, whoever they may be, authorized by law and empowered by the appointment of the President and the confirmation of the Senate to act in the matter of negotiations, and then the Senate of the United States has the power to ratify or to reject their action.

I do not hold to the doctrine, nor do I understand that the President holds to it in his message, that the Congress of the United States by a mere enactment can empower commissioners to negotiate unsettled diplomatic questions between these two countries in such a way as that their conclusions will become binding upon the country, although the Senate may never have anything to say about the matter in the ratification of the result of their work.

Mr. FRYE. Then the language of the President of the United States was exceedingly unfortunate in his message; and the Senate will bear me witness that I have as yet said nothing touching a reciprocal treaty. I have entered as yet no objection to the treaty-making power negotiating, because I regard the protection of the two-thirds vote in the Senate as ample.

There are no petitions for it, no requests I ought to make an exception. A half dozen very prominent commission merchants in Boston came to Washington and spent a considerable length of time here. They appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, and they also appeared before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which unfortunately then only consisted of one person, myself; and after they had heard my views they concluded not to discuss the question before me, and returned to Boston.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You appeared before them?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; I appeared before them. They were intelligent and undoubtedly honest gentlemen. They wanted a commission. They wanted Canada to have our markets, and without hesitation proclaimed it, if we could have a proper quid pro quo. Shortly after their return home one of them wrote to his principals in St. John, New Brunswick, and the letter has been reproduced in the Boston Herald. I have it, and I call the attention of the Senate to the American citizens who in the interest of the American people were here for a commission. I ask the Secretary to read the letter I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I have been to Washington. If I could see you, I would like to tell you about it, but it is too long a story to put on paper. I feel that we have accomplished some good, which may be apparent at a later date, although the immediate purpose of our visit might be classed as a failure; in other words, I am nearly satisfied that no commissioners will be appointed this year. The objection is to this form of settlement; the Halifax award still rankles. But after an interview with the Secretary of State, I am sure that the administration does not intend to let the matter rest. It can negotiate a treaty with Great Britain to-morrow if it chooses, and I believe that this will be done before long. That treaty must be ratified by the Senate, and "there's the rub." It may not be done this year.

Mr. FRYE will oppose any treaty with all his might. He told me so. Mr. FRYE is a "mighty smart man," that is as a politician. He is a very poor statesman, in my opinion. If he can not beat a treaty, he will try to stave it off as long as he can. So, although it is possible that a treaty can be put through the Senate during the present session, which will probably last till July, I think the chances are that nothing will be done until another year. I now hope that Canada will strictly enforce the provisions of the treaty of 1818. It is policy for her to do so, even if it causes temporary inconvenience to some of her people. One would suppose that the advantages of this course would be apparent. I approved of the extension of privileges by your government, but the situation has changed. I have not time to explain myself in detail. But some things look as if your government might not take this course. For instance, I hear that your fishermen are to be allowed to take clam bait in bond. So they will continue to buy it from Portland, which is doing everything in its power to prevent a treaty. If your people would dig their own clams for a season they would make Portland howl. There is one way in which a damaging blow could be dealt to our vessel-owners, but I have no hope that it will be done. Let the two, three, or four thousand (I have been unable to find out how many there are) Nova Scotians who fish in the American fleet refuse to do so for a year. We would have Gloucester and Provincetown on their knees.

But, as this must be a voluntary act of the individual, and as the individual must get his bread and butter from year to year, I suppose it is hopeless. As our fishing ports could not man their vessels without foreigners (the native American does not go fishing to any extent) this course would be a sure cure. It is too heroic a remedy, I am afraid, to be tried. The 3-mile limit is of insignificance compared with these other privileges, getting fresh bait, sending mackerel home from Prince Edward Island and Canso, &c. I notice that the Halifax Chronicle thinks that the Boston fish bureau has not been very active. Let me say to you that we have done all that could be done by us, and I now doubt if we could accomplish more, even if we had gone to Washington earlier and spent a good deal more money. That is another thing that I should not have time to explain to you in detail. I have devoted nearly my entire time to the matter for two months, and probably half my time for three or four months previously. What do I gain by it? When I see certain commission merchants of Boston who have not lifted a finger to help me, and who have not manifested the slightest interest in the matter, getting more consignments from Nova Scotia than I am, it makes me swear. I am sick of the whole business. I am seriously considering whether it will not be best for me to leave it and try to get into something else. I can't go on for many years spending twice as much as I make. Time is too valuable, at my period of life, to waste it in an unprofitable business, and the past season has been worse than I anticipated.

Mr. FRYE. The writer is one of the American citizens who came here!

Mr. GRAY. I should like to know what is the name of this enthusiastic admirer of the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. I decline to give it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the date of that letter?

The CHIEF CLERK. "Sunday morning, Boston, February 28, 1886."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the date of the paper. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. FRYE. It was written after he had been to Washington, about the middle of February, just after his return home.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is rather peculiar that the Senator from Maine would desire to bring a statement of that kind before the Senate in such an anonymous way and then decline to give the name of the author. I suppose he was reflecting on the President or Secretary of State, a Democratic administration, or somebody.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, Mr. President, is was not read, and the Senator from Alabama will do me the justice to say that it was not read for any such purpose. It was merely to illustrate the fact that the only people in the United States who came here in favor of this commission were some gentlemen engaged in the commission fish business in the city of Boston, and this was one of the representative men. That was all I read it for, and they were representing a foreign interest.

Mr. MORGAN. There were some very honorable gentlemen here from Boston, and I will bring their names into this debate before we get through, and I will try to separate between those honorable gentlemen from Boston and this dishonorable man who seems to have been trying all he could to circumvent the interests of his own people and the honor of his own country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He was doing what he was employed to do.

Mr. FRYE. What have we to ask of Canada? Wood, water, and shelter? We have them now, under the treaty of 1818, and if we had not, no civilized nation in this day would dare refuse them. The right to capture bait in their waters? We could not enforce it under the old treaty and we would not under a new. The right to fish in their waters? I have shown conclusively that we could not avail ourselves of this right if they would pay us a bounty for encouragement. To dry fish on their shores? This was once of value, when the epicures of New England demanded dun-fish, dried on the shore, without salt, but probably we have not so dried a thousand fish under this treaty and shall never again even if allowed. Commercial privileges would be convenient, and in my opinion we are entitled to them, regardless of the abrogation of the treaty of Washington, even if the treaty of 1818 is now revived. The commission merchants of Boston, in their hearing before the House Committee on Foreign Relations, urged with great force the necessity of our fishermen enjoying the right to purchase bait and ice in the ports of the Dominion, and asserted that under the treaty of 1818, the terms of which now applied, we were no longer entitled to such privilege.

That was why they wanted the commission, as they said, to settle it and give us the right. The Senator from Vermont says it is not so clear now. We do not require near so much fish for bait now as we once did; and besides we can get it at home, we can salt it and carry it with us. Still the right to buy bait and ice in Canadian ports is a valuable privilege to our fishermen to-day; they are so far from home when on those banks. It is not indispensable, to be sure.

Mr. President, the Canadian Government to-day insists that we have no such right. The commissioner of marine insists in his proclamation that we have no such right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator does not mean that the Canadian authorities say that a vessel of the United States, not a fishing vessel, may not go to any Canadian port and buy anything that is open to sale in the markets there?

Mr. FRYE. They are very careful to say "fishing vessels."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes.

Mr. FRYE. I do not know whether they understand it so well as the Senator from Vermont does. We could easily get around it by sending one of our ordinary registered vessels there to buy all the bait alongshore and distribute it among our fishermen. Whether they are sharp enough to recognize this, I do not know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That under existing treaties we have a perfect right to do.

Mr. FRYE. I contend that we have that right for our fishermen from the fact that under existing laws every fishing vessel is equipped with a permit from the Government to trade with foreign countries and that puts her on an equality with a registered vessel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes. The Canadians do not deny that an ordinary commercial registered vessel of the United States has a right to trade in anything anywhere in the ports of the Provinces, and if, therefore, our vessel chooses to go there to buy a few tons of bait, or ice, or anything else, and go to sea with it, it has a perfect right to do so under existing treaties.

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly; and I contend further that our fishing vessels, being armed with a permit to trade in foreign countries, have thereby conferred upon them all the privileges attaching to a registered vessel, and that they have a right to go into those ports to buy bait and ice; not under treaty however. I fail to find that any treaties between the United States and Great Britain have ever taken up the question of commercial privileges or that they are the creatures of treaty power at all. As I said in the Senate the other day, it seems to me they are the creation entirely of law and I refer the Senate and the Senator from Vermont to the laws of 1820, of 1823, of 1830, and one or two acts of the British Parliament covering the same period and the proclamation of Andrew Jackson made in 1830.

The British colonial system and the act of Congress of April 18, 1818, united to make an absolute non-intercourse of trade and commerce between British North America and the United States. The acts of 1820 and 1823 modified slightly this non-intercourse. Acts of Parliament, our legislation in 1830, and the proclamation of President Jackson in October, 1830, united to establish commercial intercourse. As a matter of fact, as between Great Britain and us commercial privileges have never been the subject of treaties, except incidentally in the reciprocity treaty of 1854, have always been the creations of law.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate, as I did the other day, to one further fact which is of greater importance decidedly, an act of Parliament of June 26, 1849. Senators will remember that for years we had been proffering to the British Government a repeal of our navigation laws. It had been our earnest desire to effect that repeal and modification and over and over again we had made the proffer to Great Britain. June 26, 1849, she accepted it in all its fullness and opened all her ports to our vessels.

Mr. MORGAN. Do I understand the Senator from Maine to say that she accepted that proffer as a matter of negotiation and actual agreement?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir, a proffer by law.

Mr. MORGAN. You mean that the enactments of the two countries were on parallel lines?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, ours a little ahead of hers.

Mr. MORGAN. Similar?

Mr. FRYE. Similar, ours a little ahead of hers, so that in effect it was a proffer. Now I say that excepting the coastwise trade of both countries, for both were excepted, that act of 1849 of the English Parliament, our law made just prior to it, the proclamation of the President of the United States, Mr. Taylor, and the proclamation of the Queen of Great Britain opened all the ports of the two countries one to the other for trading purposes, and gave us the same commercial privileges and rights in the Canadian ports that the Canadians enjoy in ours.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator give us a more specific reference to the proclamation of President Taylor?

Mr. FRYE. I have not it here.

Mr. GRAY. I should like very much to hear it.

Mr. FRYE. I have not got it here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is in the Statutes at Large undoubtedly.

Mr. FRYE. No, it is not there. I have tried to find it. I read the other day the message of Zachary Taylor in which he alludes to it and alludes to the effect of the enactment of these two provisions of law on the part of Great Britain and the United States, which he says have fortunately for both countries opened up all the ports of the two countries to these commercial rights and privileges.

Mr. GRAY. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, but merely in the line of argument he was making I thought it was important to those not familiar with the whole business to see that proclamation.

Mr. BUTLER. Let it be inserted in the Senator's remarks.

Mr. FRYE. If I can get it I will insert it in my remarks. I read the other day the message of President Taylor alluding to it.

I contend that under those laws and proclamations Canada is entirely mistaken in the position which she assumes to-day, and that we have the same rights in her ports that she has in ours; and within a week she has had a dozen vessels in our ports buying bait at Portland and Gloucester.

Mr. MORGAN. The same commercial rights, you mean?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, the same commercial rights, not the same fishing rights. I am glad the Senator made the suggestion. I do not claim that we have any fishing rights at all within the 3-mile shore line, because we are living under the treaty of 1818, and as I have undertaken to show we do not want them; they are good for nothing; but the right to purchase bait and ice in the Canadian ports is ours to-day if they have any such right in ours; and if they close their ports against us for bait and ice, all that we have to do is to close our ports against them. It will be the first and highest duty of the Congress of the United States to do it.

Mr. MORGAN. Can not that be done by a proclamation of the President?

Mr. FRYE. Whether it must be by an act of Congress I am not prepared to say. Congress can authorize the President undoubtedly to make proclamation.

Mr. MORGAN. Has not Congress already authorized the President to do so?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have no right to do it at all except as to what their laws may say about fishing vessels under the existing treaties. The right to free commercial intercourse, the incoming and outgoing for commerce and trade, is complete.

Mr. FRYE. So I do not know of anything we want of Canada. I know of no market of hers that we desire. She has had a protective tariff for five or six years now and has built up her manufacturing industries under it, so that she is buying comparatively little of us or of Great Britain in the way of manufactured products. We sold her refined sugar to the extent of millions of dollars a few years ago, but she has built up her own refineries now and buys comparatively nothing of us.

The right of our fishermen to-day, armed with a permit to trade, to buy bait and ice rests on precisely the same basis as the right to purchase any other article they have to sell; and should this right be denied, Congress can promptly and effectually retaliate by excluding British colonial shipping from our ports. In these regards our intercourse with these colonies depends entirely on legislation, not on treaties. There is not the slightest danger of Great Britain assenting to any interruption of these priv-ileges, to any interference with this intercourse. Newfoundland, a few years since, passed a law prohibiting the sale of bait and ice to our fishermen, but Great Britain refused her assent to the legislation.

Mr. President, I assert, without fear of contradiction by any man engaged in the fishing business—I do not mean importer of fish—that we have nothing to ask of Canada. She has no control over, nor exclusive interest in, any waters where we desire to fish for cod, haddock, halibut, or mackerel. Then what is there for a commission to settle, so far as we are concerned? Canada, I admit, does seek something of us. Our market is to her an absolute necessity. But, under a recent ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, that solidly-frozen halibut, frozen for weeks, brought into Gloucester by the vessel-load, were "fish fresh for immediate consumption," and not dutiable, a market is opened up to Canada for at least 600,000,000 pounds of fish annually. I said we asked nothing of Canada, but we do demand of our Secretary of the Treasury that in construing our tariff laws, if he is in doubt, we and not Canada shall have the benefit of the doubt. Since that item was put into our tariff law the whole method of preserving fish fresh has changed. Then they must be consumed at once, or cured by salt or smoking, but now with freezing processes, refrigerators on fishing vessels, on steamers, on cars, and in every great market, fish are kept fresh as long as they are preserved good by curing. If the Secretary will wisely reconsider this decision, and find some way to rule that small herring, brought in fresh to-day, and to-morrow boiled in oil and made sardines, shall be admitted free of duty, his conclusions will be much more beneficent for his countrymen.

Mr. MORGAN. Can we not get the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to find out whether he is right or not?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Vermont calls my attention to an act of 1823 which authorizes the President to issue proclamation at any time without any further enactment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When there is discrimination made against our vessels in British ports.

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I understood the law to be. It is not necessary to have any additional Congressional action about it. The President by proclamation can declare non-intercourse.

Mr. FRYE. I have stated the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury which has opened our markets to all fresh fish. Since that item was put into the tariff bill the whole process of curing fish has changed, as has that of taking fish. It meant fish taken to-day and eaten to-morrow when that law was made. Now it may mean fish taken to-day and eaten six months from now. By the modern freezing process you can keep fish fresh as long as you please. You can bring in a cargo of salmon; I have seen them frozen down in the lower province at Campbellton; I have seen ten thousand of them in one single lot frozen by the modern process as solid as lead itself, so that you could not chop it with an ax. They can be brought into our markets in refrigerators on board ship, sent to your market-houses, kept there in refrigerators for six months or a year, and sold for fresh fish.

Mr. MORGAN. Did I understand the Senator to say that the process of freezing fish and bringing them into the market fresh has been recent, since the enactment of the tariff law?

Mr. FRYE. Since the enactment of the tariff law. I say the refrigerators on vessels, on steamboats and cars, and the salmon-freezing process, and other freezing processes, so far as I know, have all come into existence since that item was put into the tariff.

Mr. MORGAN. Then it requires action on the part of Congress to remedy that difficulty arising out of the new discovery.

Mr. FRYE. I am not saying that the Secretary of the Treasury is wrong. I am saying that under his construction of the law our market to-day is open to Canada for 600,000,000 pounds of fish a year. I wish the Secretary of the Treasury had seen his way clear to have given a doubt, if he had one, in favor of the American citizen rather than in favor of the Canadian.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not understand the Senator from Maine as complaining of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I understood him as making the point in favor of the Canadians that they had beaten Congress at a game of freeze-out.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, no, not at all. Mr. President, I want to tackle a practical question now. Ought Canada to have our market? Is there any good reason why she should have it?

Mr. MORGAN. Does that mean whether we ought to repeal the tariff on fish? Is not that the question the Senator is about to discuss?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir, in a little different way, perhaps, than what the Senator suggests. I simply want to know if Canada ought to have our market, and I propose to show reasons why she ought not to have it unless she pays for it, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] suggests. That can only be done in another way; by a commission, probably.

Mr. President, ought the Canadian in justice to have free access to our markets? Consider for a moment the advantages he enjoys over our fishermen. He pays no Federal taxes, nor State, nor county, nor municipal. He helps build no school-houses, nor roads, nor does he participate in the support of our schools, nor our poor, nor our police. In event of war he owes us no allegiance and gives us no service. If the war is with England, he mans the ships of the enemy. His government pays him bounties, amounting in 1882 to $172,309, about $2 a ton to vessels engaged in the fisheries and $5 to each man employed in the boat fisheries. His vessels, built largely of the softer woods, cost him only a little more than one-half as much as ours. There is no duty on his cordage, his supplies, or his nets. The men are content with wages and a living costing a quarter less than ours.

Allow me, Mr. President, to illustrate a few of these differences. The pay, last year, of men hired on Canadian vessels was from $75 to $82 for the trip, while the wages of the American crew for the voyage of about four months were from $120 to $190. The Canadian crew were obliged to prepare the vessel for sea, discharge her, wash the fish caught on return to port, and await the sale of the cargo for payment. While the American crew do nothing of the kind, and are promptly paid on arrival at home port. The Dominion owners employ women and girls to handle, cure, and dry their fish at 25 cents a day, or 6 cents an hour, while the Americans employ men for the same work at from 20 to 30 cents an hour.

One of their vessels belonging to Yarmouth made last year two trips to the banks and returned with 2,400 quintals of cod, while an American vessel, owing to the greater distance from the grounds, made but one trip and took 1,400 quintals. The cost of the Canadian vessel referred to, prepared for sea, was $4,000; of the American, 12 tons less in measurement, was $5,500. The outfit of the Canadian was from $1,900 to $2,000, of the American $3,000. "The Dominion report of fisheries" shows that their fishing vessels, prepared for sea, classed in British or French Lloyds, cost from $40 to $50 a ton, while our best vessels cost from $90 to $110 a ton.

Mr. President, I submit that with all these advantages they ought not to have our market without paying an adequate compensation for it. Again, the duty on fish is the lowest duty in the schedule; a duty for revenue only, only half the duty that the Canadians put upon fish as against us and have kept upon our fish going there.

Again I say that these men are the hardest worked, the poorest paid, the most exposed of any men in the United States who labor for a living.

Mr. MORGAN. Do you mean our fishermen or the Canadian fishermen?

Mr. FRYE. Our fishermen.

Mr. MORGAN. The Canadian fishermen are not so badly off, then?

Mr. FRYE. What account I have given of them indicates they are badly off.

Mr. MORGAN. I understood the Senator to say they only got about half the pay of ours.

Mr. FRYE. I did not say that. The proportion is about two-thirds.

Mr. MORGAN. Ours are the worst paid men in the United States?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. And the Canadians are paid only two-thirds of what our men get, and yet they are increasing their fleet all the time.

Mr. FRYE. I say to the Senator from Alabama that in an average good year our fishermen do not average $300 apiece, and last year they did not average $150.

Mr. MORGAN. How long is the season?

Mr. FRYE. From four to six months, and sometimes it goes the year through. They start mackerel fishing in March now. But perhaps the Senator will agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts who wrote the letter to his principal in St. John, that the American people want cheaper fish, and that therefore the Canadian should have our market in order to make them cheaper.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the Americans want cheap fish except those who catch them. Whether they ought to have it is a question that I did not suppose was a material question in this debate, but I find that it is. I find that the whole debate hinges on the question of what the tariff ought to be, whether it ought to be increased or maintained at what it is.

Mr. FRYE. I have said no such thing. I have said that the Canadians want our market. They do not want it by paying duties to get it, but still I am willing to accept the other issue at any time and to discuss that. But let me say to the Senator from Alabama that carefully prepared statistics show that the price of fish in our market has been no less when Canada had free access to it than before Canada had access to it without a duty, but on the contrary a little higher.

Our Government used to pay bounties to our fishermen, but repealed them all in 1866. Our vessels are built of the best white oak. Equipment and supplies are subject to a Federal tax. The men assist in the support of all of our institutions and help pay all of our taxes. Is there any justice in exposing them to a free and open competition in their own markets? Ought not the Canadian fisherman to pay some equivalent for his exemptions? But, it is urged, the people are interested in obtaining cheaper fish. The statistics do not prove that the payment of our small duty increases the price received by the fishermen for their fish. It must be remembered that he receives only two-fifths of the cost of his fish to the consumer, while transportation and the middlemen share the other three-fifths. Besides, these fishermen in the best seasons do not average in earnings more than $300 each, and last year the average was not quite $100. Surely no man would ask that his fellow-man should expose himself to the dangers and hardships of the fisherman's life for smaller compensation than this. Why, sir, common humanity, a decent regard for the rights of others, would compel him to say: "If eating free fish offend my brother fishermen, then I'll eat no more free fish while the world lasts."

The duty is so low that demand and supply regulate the market prices rather than the law, but free access to our markets on the part of the Canadian fishermen introduces an additional uncertainty in the business, already so full of hazard. The custom of sailing on shares, that is, the vessel, outfit, &c., receiving one-half of the catch, the captain and crew the other half, was formerly almost universal; but latterly the crews very frequently insist upon wages rather than chances, and should this become the rule it would be a fatal blow to the business, for the owners will be slow to take the additional risk of wages, and, besides, it would have a tendency to lower the standard of the service rendered.

But, Mr. President, I said that I could not admit that the price of fish was enhanced by the duty, and I produce the statistics sustaining my opinion:

Mr. President, the Republic itself has a deep and an abiding interest in this fishing industry. Can it see with indifference its gradual decay, and regard without lively concern its certain extinction? Will it enter no protest against the deadly blows struck by its own treaty-making power? During the last thirty years it has been exposed to twenty-four of unrestricted competition with a foreign power, and in that time the Government has withdrawn all friendly bounties. In a quarter of a century its fleet has decreased about 125,000 tons and a thousand vessels, while the demand for the products of the sea has increased tenfold. Has it forgotten that its proud position was largely won by the endurance, skill, courage, and fidelity of these sailors; that Louisburg was wrested from the French by their valor, and that these very waters, now in contention, were secured to Great Britain by their courage? Can she be unmindful of their conspicuous services in the war for our independence? Listen to the testimony of General Knox, then a member of the Massachusetts Legislature. Marblehead had petitioned for a bank-charter, and the opposition was pronounced. General Knox said:

I am surprised that Marblehead should ask so small a privilege as that of banking, and that there should be opposition to it. Sir, I wish the members of this body knew the people of Marblehead as well as I do. I wish that they had stood on the banks of the Delaware River in 1777, in that bitter night when the commander-in-chief had drawn up his little army to cross it, and had seen the powerful current bearing onward the floating masses of ice, which threatened destruction to whosoever should venture on its bosom. I wish that when this occurrence threatened to defeat the enterprise they could have heard that distinguished warrior demand, "Who will lead us on?" and seen the men of Marblehead, and Marblehead alone, stand forward to lead the army along the perilous path to unfolding glories and honors. There, sir, went the fishermen of Marblehead, alike at home upon land or water, alike ardent, patriotic, and unflinching wherever they unfurled the flag of the country.

Who will deny that the glories we won in 1812 on lake and on sea were their achievement? Who does not know that in our last terrible struggle for life there was not a deck of our fleet unmoistened with their blood? If we ever have another war, which God forbid, it will be on the sea. Who shall man our fleet? It is asserted, and I believe truly, that 85 per cent. of the sailors employed in our ocean foreign-carrying trade are foreigners, owing our country no allegiance and inspired by no love for our flag. They surely would be a broken reed in the hour of national peril. Of the one hundred thousand men in our fishing fleet 88 per cent. are American citizens, 65 per cent. of American birth. Inured to every hardship, exposed to constant danger, fighting a ceaseless battle with wind and wave, loving freedom for freedom's sake, and ready on call to defend their rights; courageous, skilled, and patriotic, they are to-day the best and most reliable sailors in the world, and to a man would promptly respond to their country's call.

Why then should these men be selected for sacrifice, and their rights be surrendered to the tender mercies of British diplomacy? Of all our industries this alone is left unprotected, and the men employed in it are the most exposed, the hardest worked, and the poorest paid. The duty which England seeks to repeal is the lowest in the list of duties, less than that on any agricultural products, not one-half so great as that on any manufacture; two-thirds lower than that on sugar and rice; lower than that on beef, or mutton, or pork. Outside of England no one seeks its repeal other than a few of our city importers of fish, who are practically nothing more than agents of Canada. From the people of our country no such demand comes to us; on the contrary the protests from the Atlantic, the Gulf, the Pacific coasts, and from the great lakes are pouring into Congress.

Now, sir, what do these fishermen ask? In this emergency, when England is demanding one more sacrifice and the Administration seems to have been beguiled by the allurements of the British minister and Sir Ambrose Shea, their first and most earnest prayer is "to be let alone." Tossed about for a century by the winds and waves of English diplomacy, buffeted by Canadian penal laws, stripped and dismantled in Provincial courts, it seems to them if only their country would say to this tempestuous sea, "Peace, be still," their cup of content would be full. The resolution now under consideration answers this demand. But, Mr. President, the Republic should demand more than this of Congress. It should insist, first, that Great Britain must abstain from the assumption of "a territorial or any other jurisdiction over the vessels of the United States navigating or harboring in the open seas under the flag of the United States, whether within or without three miles of the shore; second, upon the ordinary rights of hospitality, 'wood, water, and shelter,'" regardless of treaties.

Third. Upon the same commercial privileges in the ports and harbors of the Dominion of Canada as she enjoys in ours. If these are not accorded, then that Congress should promptly resort to retaliatory legislation, and our Government send into those waters armed cruisers, not to perpetrate any wrongs upon or do any injustice to our neighbors, but to protect our own citizens from outrage. As to legislation otherwise, very little is required. Our fishermen are not asking for bounties or subsidies. They ought, however, to be included in all the benefits conferred by the statute on our ocean-going tonnage, especially the right to withdraw from bond, free of duty, supplies and equipment. They ask no increase of duty, though the Canadian duty is double of ours both on fresh and cured fish. It should either be provided by law or determined by a decision of the Secretary of the Treasury that fish preserved by artificial freezing shall not be admitted to our markets free, under the clause of the tariff, "fish fresh, for immediate consumption;" that small herring to be converted into sardines, capelin, and squids for bait shall be admitted free; that all fish of every kind taken by vessels of the United States licensed for the fisheries in any waters, or by the crews of said vessels, or by any person, means, or method employed by the masters of said vessels, and which are delivered fresh on board such vessels and cured or preserved thereon and brought to the United States by such vessels, shall be deemed the product of the American fisheries and entitled to free entry. It being understood that the above liberty shall not apply to the employment of vessels under foreign registry or to their crews, boats, seines, nets, or other appurtenances belonging to such foreign vessels.

Mr. President, these are not serious demands, and I trust that the importance of the industry urging them upon Congress will be regarded as a complete justification for their favorable consideration. But, sir, the first and absolutely necessary condition to stop the progress of decline and decay is an emphatic declaration of the Senate against the recommended commission, and as this is a question into which no politics nor partisanship can intrude, I sincerely hope that the vote recorded for this resolution shall be so decisive in its majority as to allay all excitement, and remove all apprehension from the minds of the intelligent, brave, and loyal sailor-fishermen of the Republic.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the unfinished business be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. EUSTIS, in section 3, line 2, after the word "qualified," to insert the word "male;" so as to make the section read:

That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified male electors resident within said boundaries are hereby authorized, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, in the chair). Is the Senate ready for the question on the pending amendment?

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, but I do not wish to be understood by that vote as being in favor of woman suffrage. The right of the women of Washington Territory to vote has been in existence for about three years. Congress has certainly acquiesced in the exercise of the right. Believing as I do that the people of that Territory have the power to regulate those matters for themselves, I shall vote against the amendment. It is their affair and not mine. They must live under the constitution which is adopted by the qualified electors of that Territory, and I shall be content to leave the settlement of all those questions to the people of the Territory.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I rather think I will vote for this bill no matter what amendments may be adopted or rejected, because I think Washington Territory is entitled to admission as a State, but I shall certainly vote for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, and I would extend it still further. I think great care ought to be exercised in framing a constitution for a new Territory which is hereafter to be the home of people from every State in the Union. The Territories are subject to our exclusive control, and are governed directly or indirectly by Congress as the agent or trustee for all the people of all the States who are expected to fill them up in the near future. I do not think that the people who first happen to go to a Territory, it may be for mere temporary or speculative purposes, should be regarded absolutely as the only persons who are entitled to frame the fundamental law of the incoming State for all time to come. For example, in the laws enacted by the Territorial Legislature of the Territory of Washington, as I find them in the act approved November 23, 1883, it is provided that—

All American citizens above the age of twenty-one years and all American half-breeds over that age, who have adopted the habits of the whites, and all other inhabitants of this Territory above that age, who shall have declared on oath their intentions to become citizens at least six months previous to the day of the election, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the organic act of this Territory at least six months previous to the day of election; and who shall have resided six months in the Territory and thirty days in the county, next preceding the day of election, and none other shall be entitled to hold office or vote at any election in this Territory.

SEC. 2. Wherever the word "his" occurs in the chapter aforesaid, it shall be construed to mean "his" or "her," as the case may be.

That provision means that all persons who see fit to go to Washington Territory and stay there six months, whether they are Canadians or Chinamen, or from any other country under the sun, if they swear that they intend to become citizens, shall be entitled to vote. The people who can vote under that act of the Territorial Legislature are not either necessarily or presumptively the sort of people who ought to be allowed to frame a State constitution. While the Congress of the United States may properly allow persons who go to a Territory in the first instance to pass such local laws relating solely to their own immediate wants as will in their opinion best promote their interests for the time being, when it comes to pass an organic act or authorize the formation of a State constitution Congress ought to take care that such a constitution is formed by bona fide citizens of the United States as will meet the approval of Congress and reflect the wisdom of the assembled representatives of the people, as it is our clear duty to promote the best welfare of all the people of the United States; and every citizen of every State should feel when he goes to the new State that he is going there under a constitution which has met the approval of the representatives of the people of all the States. Although Washington Territory allows every human being from any country in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, who is twenty-one years of age, male or female, to become a voter in that Territory for local purposes, without being even a citizen of the United States, I insist that Congress ought not to allow a people with no higher obligation or closer connection to this Government to frame a constitution under which all the people of all the States who may see fit to go there and make their permanent homes should be required to live. The mere accident, it may be, whereby a few miners have prospected for six months, or a few Canadians or a squad of Chinamen or a few people who have come from any other part of the world and declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and may never consummate that intention by naturalization, ought not to vest them with power to frame an organic act, merely because the act of the Territorial Legislature provides that they are electors for local purposes in that Territory. It is not, in my judgment, wise action on the part of Congress to abridge its undoubted right to prescribe who shall and who shall not vote for the proposed constitution merely because it has sanctioned local Territorial laws extending suffrage to all sorts of people. The people of the whole country have the right to the wisest and best considered constitution that Congress can secure, regardless of the few settlers there now, none of whom have a right to vote for the new constitution, unless we confer that right upon them by this act.

When a State is once a State and its people by the sanction and authority of Congress have assumed all the responsibility of a State, then I agree that they may make any provision relative to suffrage that they please. Until then they are in our hands and we are responsible for the laws enacted. The Congress of the United States has declared who shall be citizens in the following language, and the presumption is irresistible, and none but citizens can vote or hold office under or by virtue of Congressional authority:

SEC. 2165. An alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States in the following manner, and not otherwise:

First. He shall declare on oath, before a circuit or district court of the United States, or a district or supreme court of the Territories, or a court of record of any of the States having common-law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk, two years, at least, prior to his admission, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and, particularly, by name, to the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty of which the alien may be at the time a citizen or subject.

Again—

Third. It shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court admitting such alien that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the State or Territory where such court is at the time held one year at least; and that during that time he has behaved as a man of a good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well-disposed to the good order and happiness of the same; but the oath of the applicant shall in no case be allowed to prove his residence.

Section 2170 provides that—

No alien shall be admitted to become a citizen who has not for the continued term of five years next preceding his admission resided within the United States.

These are the leading provisions in regard to citizenship, and those provisions ought to apply to every non-resident in Washington Territory who seeks to take part in framing a constitution or to hold office under a constitution for a great Territory like that, which is, I hope, soon to become a State, and in my opinion in the next ten years one of the most prosperous States in the United States. It has as many advantages as any State in the Union can possibly have, as Senators have been advised fully by others who have spoken on this subject. Assuming as I do that Congress has absolute control over this subject, I insist that it is not only the right but the duty of Congress to see to it that this proposed fundamental law is not adopted or put in operation by any other than citizens of the United States, any Territorial law or temporary regulation to the contrary notwithstanding. When the Territory of Washington, in order to induce population to go there, or for any other purpose, allowed a man from any part of the world, as I said, from Asia, Europe, Africa, or America, to vote or hold office, who locates there for six months and declares his intention merely to become a citizen, that is not the class of people who ought to be allowed by Congress to take control of or frame a constitution for that great Territory. That is a subject under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, because all the people of all the States are interested in it and have a right to go there and take possession of the public lands and enjoy the proceeds of the school lands, the homesteads, the pre-emptions, the everything that is tempting and calculated to induce population to go from other States. Therefore I repeat that the organic act for the new State should be framed by citizens of the United States and only by citizens of the United States, and not by any set of people, male or female, who may have for six months domiciled themselves there.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether the law which permits those men to take part in the management of the Territory and in framing the organic act was not put in force by citizens of the United States; in other words, whether the citizens of the United States in the Territory have not themselves of their own motion extended the privileges they have to the aliens?

Mr. BECK. I do not know whether they were citizens or not who did that.

Mr. BUTLER. And the act was approved by Congress.

Mr. HOAR. And it was approved by Congress.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to Congress approving the greatest liberty and allowing the largest rights over mere local affairs in the Territory to any body of men, whether they are citizens or aliens; but when Congress comes to frame an organic act converting that Territory into a State, and when Congress frames laws or gives its authority and direction to that end, because it has absolute power to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which new States shall be admitted, we are the men who are required to determine the question of policy as we are doing now in passing the act under consideration. I think in delegating that power and authority Congress should confine it to the citizens of the United States.

I know it was the law of Minnesota and the law of many Territories, when they were seeking to obtain population to take possession of and cultivate their wild lands and bring not only wealth and prosperity but protection to the frontier. In order to induce people from all parts of the world to come, they allowed them to vote after six months' residence. Many of these voters were unable to read, many of them never heard of the Constitution of the United States. Still they were interested in good local government. But it is a very different proposition when men are acting upon mere local laws, temporarily to protect their lives, their liberty, and their property, from a proposition to have persons of that sort, who may be temporarily there, frame and administer an organic act such as the constitution of a future State. It is the duty of the representatives of the people of all the States, as we are called upon now to frame or cause to be framed a State constitution, to indicate who shall have power to make it, and we ought to place it in the hands only of our own citizens. That is what I mean.

Therefore, I will go even further than the Senator from Louisiana, and I would insert in section 3 not only the word "male," so as to read "qualified 'male' electors resident within said boundaries," but I would add so as to make it read, "who are citizens of 'the United States under the laws thereof,' are hereby authorized, after due proclamation by the governor," &c., to determine what shall be the constitution.

I have no doubt that all Senators who favor woman suffrage will oppose the amendment. That is logical; that is consistent; but I am unable to understand the consistency of gentlemen who say they are opposed to woman suffrage and yet in this particular case authorize women to vote for this constitution because the Territorial Legislature saw fit to allow them to vote on local questions. If women vote for the constitution it will be only because Congress authorizes them by this act and not by virtue of any right acquired by the act of the Territorial Legislature.

Congress might very well sanction the most extended suffrage asked for when laws relate only to roads, and schools, and mills, and the stopping of gambling and liquor shops, and perhaps it might work very well, and yet not be prepared to establish a new principle in the formation of a constitution of a great State by extending that privilege to fundamental legislation, as this bill provides, regardless of race, nationality, citizenship, color, or previous condition.

Mr. GEORGE. Or sex.

Mr. BECK. Certainly, regardless of sex. I will go as far as any man to aid women in obtaining all the employments possible to elevate their present condition, but I am not prepared either in regard to Washington Territory or anywhere else, if I can help it, to confer upon them the right of suffrage, mainly because the fifteenth amendment as well as this bill provides that there shall be no discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition.

There are intelligent women, plenty of them, in Massachusetts, in Kentucky, in every State, in Washington Territory, who are as well or better qualified to vote, if you please, than many of the male sex occupying similar positions; but Congress can not allow the most intelligent woman in any State of the Union to vote without allowing the most ignorant negro woman in any State in the South to vote. That settles the question with me. While we are contending, and contending properly, that intelligence should control at the ballot-box, we require the most intelligent foreign-born white man to live here five years before he can vote. Congress, by constitutional amendments and legislation, under bayonet rule forced suffrage upon the negro men. We are struggling with that problem now, seeking to add to their intelligence and make them voters who can act intelligently in regard to great public affairs. While involved in great difficulties in that regard now, for us to throw in the great mass of the negro women of the South at the same time is only doubling, yes, quadrupling, the difficulty and danger of the problem. We all know that the negro women are very much more ignorant than the negro men. That is a fact known to every man who has ever lived among them. The negro character is well understood by the great mass of the people. Male negroes have associated with white boys from their childhood; they have been barbers, hostlers, domestic servants; they have gone about everywhere, and by their ready power of imitation they catch and appropriate very quickly the ideas of the boys and the men they associate with. But the great mass of the negro women of the South, especially in the extreme Southern States, never had any of those privileges or advantages. They are at the washtub, they are in the kitchen and the fields, they are deprived of many opportunities that the colored men have. To add two or three million voters of that class who are absolutely ignorant is not statesmanship; it is not wise; it can not be done safely, certainly not until we have at least made the colored race, men and women, more intelligent than they are now.

As I said before, we can not confer the right of suffrage on the most intelligent woman in America without conferring it upon the most ignorant colored woman within the limits of the United States. If intelligence is to govern at the polls, and if we as statesmen are to try and take care that ignorance does not control our suffrage, we have a problem large enough and difficult enough for the next ten years at least, to bring up the intelligence of the colored men to whom suffrage has been given, without taking upon our shoulders the responsibility of conferring that high privilege upon all the colored women as well. This bill is the entering wedge to universal female suffrage for white and black, refined and ignorant, there is no disguising that fact and gentlemen can not shut their eyes to it. I enter my protest against this bill on that account more than on any other.

It seems to me to be great folly to open up the question of woman suffrage by a Territorial act in a disguised form under the authority of Congress. I confess that while I desire to see Washington become a State, and while I believe, as I said before, that it will become a great State, and I am not prepared to say at this moment that I shall not vote for the admission of the Territory as a State no matter whether the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is adopted or not, in my judgment it will be far better to declare that the constitution shall be framed by intelligent male citizens of the United States than to allow it to be done by merely six months residents who may never become citizens, or by women who are not allowed that privilege by act of Congress anywhere, and thus establish a principle which will return to plague us, because I am unable to see how Congress can deny the application of the principle of female suffrage everywhere if it establishes it in this case, over which it has absolute and unquestioned power to do as it pleases.

If after Washington Territory becomes a State, having had a constitution framed by intelligent citizens of the United States, it should see fit to adopt other rules and regulations as to suffrage, I have nothing to say; or if any State now organized passes laws permitting female suffrage, I have nothing to say; but I do maintain that it would be wise for Congress in the framing of the fundamental law to limit it to male citizens, as has been done everywhere else, and to limit the power to organize the State to citizens of the United States, as ought always to have been done, though I do not believe it has always been done.

I have been over the Western States enough to know that they are filled up with people who in order to get the right to vote declare their intention to become citizens before they either know or care anything about citizenship; they can abandon that intention after imposing a constitution on a new State. They have a right to do it the next day. They are under no obligation to become citizens because they once intended to do so; they may have had the intention at the time they made affidavit that they did so intend. There may be no special reason why Congress should interfere with those people when they were merely carrying on their local affairs for themselves, and if they wished to add to their population, to add to their security, to add to their comfort, Congress may well let them do as they choose; but when a State comes to be formed out of a Territory that question affects all the people of the United States, and not only a few pioneers who have gone there in advance. When that important step is taken we should require their constitution to be framed carefully by men who are in fact citizens and by that class of voters whom alone Congress has recognized in all of its past legislation as the persons on whom the right of suffrage should be conferred by national authority and in whom sovereignty should vest, so far as the United States undertakes to meddle with questions of suffrage.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I did not expect to say half that much. As I said before, Montana and Washington will soon become great States on some terms. I only repeat that in my judgment it would be better to limit the suffrage in the formation of their organic laws to citizens, to the men who have been required and trained to study these problems, and who can therefore safely and carefully exercise those great rights, and not launch out into such experiments as are involved in alien and female suffrage.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in the organization of Territories without exception, as I recollect, the question of determining who should be voters for the purpose of electing members of the Legislature has always been remitted to the Territories. I believe there is no exception to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. None whatever after the first organic act setting them up.

Mr. TELLER. In the State of Colorado early, twenty-five years ago nearly, we adopted substantially the same provision that we adopted in our constitution, the provision that the Senator from Kentucky objects to as to foreigners. We put in our constitution substantially what we had had in our statutes for nearly sixteen years.

> Every male person over the age of twenty-one years possessing the following qualifications shall be entitled to vote at all elections: He shall be a citizen of the United States, or, not being a citizen of the United States, he shall have declared his intention, according to law, to become such citizen not less than four months before he offers to vote.

My recollection is that all the change made in the Territorial law is that under the old Territorial law he was not required to make this declaration four months before he offered to vote. The people who passed upon the constitution, authorized to do so by an act of Congress, were the very class of people described in the constitution, and the very class of people in part at least to which the Senator from Kentucky objects.

The Senator objects to this class, and he also objects to the provision which allows the women of that Territory to vote. He is in favor not only of restricting now the people who shall pass upon the constitution to males who are either native-born citizens or have received their full naturalization papers, but he is for making a new rule for the people of Washington that never was made for any other Territory. It is true he may answer to that that no other Territory ever asked admission with female suffrage, but Congress never made any investigation, never looked into it or inquired whether they did provide for female suffrage, or what were the qualifications of their electors.

Congress in authorizing these Territories to select their own electors and fix their qualifications reserves to itself to annul or disapprove of any act in that behalf, because there has been a reservation of the right to annul all legislation of Territories if Congress saw fit. It has been, however, the theory that whenever Congress did not annul the legislation they approved of it; and, as is suggested to me, Congress has never exercised the right of annulling the act of a Legislature with reference to affairs clearly given to them under the enabling act, except in extreme cases. Since I have been in the Senate I do not recollect any case, except perhaps in relation to one single Territory. The cases have been so very few as to be observable and noticeable on that account if for nothing else.

Fifteen years ago and more two Territories at least adopted the principle of female suffrage, the Territory of Utah and the Territory of Wyoming. Three years ago the Territory of Washington also followed in the same direction. We have everywhere treated this as we have treated the question of electors, as a question for the Territory, as we have treated it and as we are compelled by law to treat it, as a question for the State. The State determines for itself who shall vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislature; and then the Constitution says for the purpose of exercising a function of national citizenship the voter that the State recognizes as entitled to vote may exercise the functions of national citizenship in the selection of a member of Congress.

The power of the voter does not come from Congress; it comes from the State; and on the other side of the Chamber, I will venture to say, it never was disputed until yesterday, if it was then, and I do not know that it is disputed now, for the honorable Senator from Kentucky says when the State is admitted he admits that the State may then fix the qualification of its electors. I understood the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] to substantially assent to the same thing, although I could not quite determine. He assents now.

Mr. President, there is not any practical question left; it is a simple sentimental or theoretical question, because the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, some of them at least, are opposed to female suffrage or are opposed to extend the suffrage to the people who have gone to that Territory to make their homes until such time as they shall have received the full and entire badge of American citizenship. I hardly expected the distinguished Senator from Kentucky to take that position. I hardly expected that he of all others would have suggested anything that would look to the curtailment of the rights of those who come to our country to make their homes and to cast their lot with us, and who show a disposition to become a part and parcel of our own people.

If the honorable Senator from Kentucky were now in his native land exercising the rights he would have a right to but for the fact that he has assumed the rights of American citizenship, I doubt very much whether he would be a home ruler. I doubt very much whether his sympathies would go out for the oppressed people of Ireland who have been struggling so many years for the right of self-government. I doubt whether he is in full sympathy with that great statesman who yesterday made the world ring with his enunciation of the rights of the people of the British Empire—the greatest speech probably upon those questions ever made, and if he is not the greatest man who made it, he is the greatest man of this day. I doubt whether he would be in sympathy with him, and I doubt whether it is proper and right at this hour when the world is moving forward toward extending to all people, irrespective of class, irrespective of sex, all rights of citizenship, the right to participate in a government—whether it is wise for the American Senate to pass on a question in such a manner as shall seem to curtail those rights and to make a retrograde movement.

I was impressed in reading the report, briefly as it is to-day, of Mr. Gladstone's great speech. He said one thing which is so true and so proper in regard to the question of home rule and home government that I wish to read it. He said, addressing the house of commons yesterday afternoon, within the last twenty-four hours:

> Something must be done, something is imperatively demanded from us to restore in Ireland the first conditions of civil life, the free course of law, the liberty of every individual in the exercise of every legal right, their confidence in the law and their sympathy with the law, apart from which no country can be called a civilized country.

Mr. President, those words will live as long as the English tongue lives; they will be immortal. There are more people to-day repeating those words and approving of the sentiment thereof than have repeated and approved the declarations of any public man in a hundred years. It is as true when applied to a woman as when applied to a man. It is as true when applied to my mother and my sister as when applied to me and to my brother. Everybody who obeys the law should have a voice in the enactment of the law, and it is when you have conceded to all the people a part and parcel in the enactments of law that you can depend on them to take part in the execution thereof. When the people shall be consulted everywhere at all times, then their will shall prevail and you will never hear the suggestion of a necessity for armed men to execute the law.

It has been my opportunity to live by the side of a community which granted to women equal rights at the polls with the men—in a community composed of separate people coming from all portions of the world, with none of the ties, with none of the associations that hold and bind together old communities. Taking up and recognizing this great fundamental principle that part and parcel in the enactment of law would carry with it the proper execution of law, they gave to women as they gave to men their rights at the polls. Order, good government, decency has been the result; and in that community there is no man of any political party, of any political faith or religious ideas who could be found, with rare exceptions, who would deny the beneficial results of that class of legislation.

I approve what was said by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] who spoke so eloquently in regard to giving these women the right to vote; and I say from observation that the evils from so doing which have been emphasized and suggested will not come.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky says that the colored women of Kentucky are not fit to vote. It is a question for Kentucky whether they shall or not. The colored women of Mississippi are not fit to vote, he says. It is a question for the people of Mississippi whether they shall or not. But will anybody say that the wife is not as well qualified intellectually and morally to discharge every duty of citizenship as the husband? Will anybody say that the girls who are brought up in the family lack the intelligence and moral qualifications that their brothers have? Does not everybody recognize the fact that in a great majority of cases the women of the country stand on a moral plane which the men do not reach, and if you want to reach the great evils of society intemperance, licentiousness, and other crimes you can rely with perfect safety upon the wives, the mothers, the sisters, and the daughters of the land. I am in favor of giving to all the women everywhere the right to vote. I am in favor of letting Kentucky legislate for herself on that question. I am in favor of letting Washington settle that for herself, as she has done, and all honor to the new State that is to be, great in everything that makes a State, that she is to be the first to take this great step in the march of improvement, and that which is eventually to come to all the States in all the land.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I do not intend to be drawn into the discussion of the merits of woman suffrage. I confined myself yesterday to purely legal and constitutional questions. I shall not attempt to convert any woman suffragist; but I desire to state with reference to the amendment that, while I suppose every woman suffragist will vote against it, if I can interpret the logic of a vote it is an impossibility for one who is against woman suffrage to vote against the amendment.

The proposition has been misstated. I deny that the amendment disfranchises women; I deny that it disfranchises anybody, for the simple reason that no one to-day in the Territory of Washington, male or female, has a legal or constitutional right to vote for delegates to a convention. When these people come before Congress and ask us, as they do, to confer upon them the right to vote, by limiting the right to vote to male citizens we do not disfranchise female citizens, because female citizens have no right whatever to vote to-day on the issue here proposed, and in order to disfranchise any voter there must be a subsisting legal right to vote.

Therefore, in the exercise of an original power by this very law we create this right of suffrage; and it seems to me perfectly idle as a matter of argument, and I address myself to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], to state that because for other purposes than what are contemplated by this proposed law, with reference to other matters entirely disconnected with the purposes of this measure, the people have a right to vote in the Territory of Washington purely in regard to Territorial matters connected with purely local and municipal concerns, if the Congress of the United States does not confer upon women the right of suffrage with reference to the calling of a constitutional convention it thereby disfranchises women.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish very much that I could see the force of the argument of my friend. If women have not the right to vote now, which I understand to be his proposition, what effect this provision of the law will have which confers suffrage upon all the qualified electors, I can not understand. In section 3 of this enabling act, for that is all it is, Congress has nothing whatever to do with the organization of a fundamental law; it simply confers upon certain people within certain prescribed limits of the public domain the right to exercise a high sovereign power, to wit, to organize a State government, and upon the organization of that State government they will be admitted into the Union. If women are not now allowed to vote, I confess I can not see for the life of me the necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. The language of the third section is:

> That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified electors resident within said boundaries are hereby authorized, &c.

I understand the Senator from Louisiana to say that females have not the right to vote now. Therefore the third section confers no such right upon them.

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator from South Carolina entirely misunderstood what I said. I know perfectly well that females have the right to vote in the Territory of Washington. They have the right to vote for members of the Legislature, and that Territorial Legislature has purely legislative power for the Territory's local affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have the right to vote for anything that any male has, have they not?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, they are on a perfect equality with male citizens so far as the question of suffrage is concerned; but my proposition is that neither the male nor the female citizen of Washington Territory has to-day the legal or constitutional right to vote at all for the purposes of this bill. I am surprised that the Senator from South Carolina does not perceive the distinction. What is the distinction? Under the law of Congress up to the time that you pass this enabling act what rights have the citizens of Washington Territory? They have the rights conferred by the act of Congress already in force and nothing else. What law gives those citizens, male or female, the right to vote for delegates to a constitutional convention to frame a constitution to establish a State government? They may do it if they choose as a fact, as a mere matter of form, but it comes to the source of power, which is Congress, and Congress has to recognize and to ratify that act before it has the slightest legal or constitutional validity.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill provides for a proclamation by the President.

Mr. EUSTIS. I speak of the general rule. The power of the President to proclaim a State to be in the Union comes from the Congress of the United States.

What I desire to impress upon Senators who are opposed to woman suffrage is that inasmuch as there is to-day no inherent or vested right in any citizen, male or female, of the Territory of Washington to vote for the purposes of this bill, the Senator from South Carolina can not escape the responsibility of creating and originating and establishing female suffrage in the Territory of Washington by voting against the amendment which I propose. You directly confer it. Who else does? The people of the Territory do not confer it upon themselves.

Mr. BUTLER. There is nothing said about female suffrage in the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. I propose to limit the bill to male citizens, and you propose to vote against the amendment because you say female citizens already have the right to vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I say that under the Territorial organization and under the laws of the Territory they have the right to vote.

Mr. EUSTIS. For what purposes?

Mr. BUTLER. For the purposes of local self-government in the Territory.

Mr. EUSTIS. I admit that.

Mr. BUTLER. Under and by authority of an act of Congress.

Mr. EUSTIS. I admit that.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not conceive for the life of me how I can be put in a position of arranging for woman suffrage in that Territory by voting for the bill and against the amendment, when nothing is said in the bill about female suffrage.

Mr. EUSTIS. But you do say it when the Congress of the United States is solicited, as in this case, for the permission of certain citizens to vote for the purpose of forming a constitution and establishing a State government. The responsibility is with Congress and not with the people of the Territory if we establish those qualifications, including the female sex, because those qualifications do not exist to-day, and it is only by virtue and by authority of this measure that that faculty is created and conferred upon women to vote in the Territory of Washington for delegates to a convention to form a State constitution.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend point out the provision of the bill which confers that power on women to vote? If he will point it out to me, then I shall admit the force of his argument.

Mr. EUSTIS. It is done because you adopt the same qualifications which exist under the Territorial law. Whether you say in express language that those who shall vote for the delegates to the convention shall be the male and female citizens over twenty-one years of age of the Territory of Washington, whether you define it expressly in exact and express terms, or whether you do it by reference to an existing Territorial law, the force and effect of your provision are precisely and identically the same.

A few Senators have appeared or affected to be very much startled by the proposition that those of us who will vote for this amendment are attempting to oppress the opposite sex and deprive them of vested rights, to withdraw from them an inherent privilege. The Congress of the United States itself, when it told the people of Washington Territory to organize themselves into a Territory, limited the right of suffrage to male citizens, as it provided that "every male citizen above the age of twenty-one," &c., shall have the right to vote for members of the Legislature at the first election. Why should my proposition be so monstrous and outrageous when the Congress of the United States has declared by a law which stands unrepealed and applies to every Territory, that when that Territory shall be organized it shall be organized only by the male citizens of that Territory who are over twenty-one years of age? If that policy be wise, if that policy be just, if that policy be sound with reference to the mere question of the organization of a Territory, I ask why should not that policy be observed and sustained with reference to the still more important question of authorizing those people not to organize a Territory, but to organize a State government for admission into the Union?

I admit that after this first election in the Territory, and when the Territory becomes a State, it will have the power to confer the right of suffrage upon whomsoever it pleases. It may confer it upon men; it may confer it upon women, and, I have no doubt, it may confer it, if it chooses, upon Chinese, upon Indians.

Now, what is the theory of the law? It is that so far as any exertion of power by Congress is concerned, even at the time of the organization of a Territory, the right of suffrage shall be limited to male citizens alone. But Congress tells the inhabitants of a Territory, "If you choose to indulge in any isms; if you choose to indulge in any idiosyncrasies; if you choose to indulge in any cranky notions, so far as your municipal and domestic government is concerned, we will permit you to do it, and you may enjoy it as much as you please;" and, therefore, exeept where an institution has been denounced as a crime, Congress has no interest whatsoever in interfering with any of the cranky notions which may find room and spread in any Territory of the United States. But when the people of a Territory come before Congress to exercise its legislative power, then upon Congress rests the responsibility whether it will approve and indorse whatever passing craze may afflict that Territorial population. The power is coexistent with the responsibility, and it is because I believe that true Democracy means manhood suffrage in this country that I am opposed to woman suffrage.

My Republican friends on the other side may disfranchise women in the Territory of Utah, married or unmarried, married once or married thrice, Mormon or anti-Mormon, Gentile or polygamous. I will not say that it is because Utah has not three electoral votes to give the candidate of the Republican party for President; but I will say this, that when the Senator from Vermont asks me what would become of the Democratic party in the Territory of Washington if the right of suffrage was confined to women, I judge from that that the Republican party expect to secure the female vote in that State.

Sir, I have my suspicions when I see a State being led into this Union by the united exertions, the united influence, and the united vote of the Republican party in the Senate, and I also have my suspicions when I perceive that when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] proposed his amendment to admit the Territory of Montana, the arguments of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] and the arguments of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] were so overpowering, unanswerable, and convincing that they compelled a unanimous Republican vote on the other side of this Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is because we are opposed to log-rolling.

Mr. EUSTIS. "Opposed to log-rolling." I know that to-day we are living in a very highly scented atmosphere of political reform. I know that under the saintly leadership of the Eatonian school of political philosophers we are all ceasing to be partisans, that we no longer recognize party obligations, party duty, party discipline, and party devoirs, that we are all to become reconciled to a life of political monasticism; but I will continue to have one failing, Mr. President, and that is in my humble way to be as watchful and as vigilant of the purposes, designs, and craft of the Republican leaders as I have endeavored to be in the past.

This amendment is aimed at no class of our people whatever. I believe that those who framed this system of government never contemplated, either as regards the State governments or the Federal Government, that the secure foundations upon which they have rested for a hundred years of manhood suffrage should be changed to the shifting foundations of the mixed suffrage of male and female citizens in this country. That view finds support, according to my interpretation of the Constitution, as late as the fourteenth amendment. The fourteenth amendment provides that—

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

I believe that this is the only provision in the Constitution which contains the word "male." This article provides that if the male voters, or, what is the same thing, if the male citizens who have the right to vote in a State are denied the right to vote, the representation of that State in Congress shall be diminished in proportion to the number of male voters who have been denied the right of suffrage by the State. It is very clear that if those who framed that article contemplated for a moment that female suffrage could exist by possibility in any State, they would have applied its provisions to female citizens as well as to male citizens, for the same reason would exist for the application; but the effect of the penalty which is inflicted upon the State because of the denial of the right to male voters is to diminish the representation in the proportion in which male voters are denied the right of suffrage.

So if you had female suffrage in a State to-day and any large class of females who had the right to vote under the constitution of the State were denied the right of suffrage, the diminution of representation would not occur with reference to that class of citizens. Taking the whole history of Congressional legislation, so far as I am able to discover, there is not a solitary line or section of a law which has ever countenanced female suffrage in any Territory or recognized the possibility of its existence in any State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did not that constitutional provision act upon an existing state of things of constitutional law and arrangement in every one of the States, just as it found them, without undertaking to go into the question of how it ought to be or ought not to be, but upon an existing condition of things in every State, just exactly as this bill proposes to take the existing autonomy of the Territory of Washington and its political power and pass upon this question?

Mr. EUSTIS. That may be true, but I think it is equally true that the fourteenth amendment applied to the future as well as to the time at which it was adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I am speaking of its application to the then existing condition of things, because the Senator will see, although it used the word "male" for the reason that every State constitution did the same thing, and took it as it was, and did not undertake therefore to interfere with State rights but acted upon the matter as it was, leaving to the State the right to regulate suffrage as between men and women. It would be impossible for a State consistently with its own constitution to disfranchise a part of its females and to enfranchise another part under similar conditions. The other part of the fourteenth amendment would prevent that, and the fifteenth amendment, taking the thing in the same way, provides that there shall be no exclusion based upon certain conditions of things, as to condition, and race, and so on, of the people who reside in the several States.

Mr. EUSTIS. There is no doubt it was framed with reference to the existing condition of things. At the same time I say that if it was in the contemplation of those who framed the fourteenth amendment that female suffrage could by possibility be established in a State, the same provisions would have been applied to female suffrage as to male suffrage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect of that, then, would be, if I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the fourteenth amendment had left out the word "male," and in the then existing condition of things, if a single State had adopted female suffrage, every other State that did not was to be deprived of its representation by just the amount of the females who were in it who would otherwise be within the voting age, which of course would be monstrous. So it was necessary to put that in exactly the form it is.

Mr. EUSTIS. There is another proposition to which I alluded yesterday and which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] characterized as monstrous and outrageous, and he used very extraordinary language. I do not mean to say that he used discourteous language, but I was surprised at the emphasis with which he declared his convictions upon this question, as though they were overruling and had to be accepted by those who listened to him. It is this, that I propose to offer an amendment to make it a condition of the admission of a State that there shall be a provision in the constitution of that State limiting the right of suffrage to male citizens. I understood his criticism to be directed not so much to the character of the amendment as to the fact itself that a Democratic Senator, a Southern Senator, should think of imposing a fundamental condition upon the admission of a State into the Union.

I have been educated in a different school from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, but I understand the amendment to embody the true States' rights Democratic doctrine as it has been taught by the great leaders of our party, that it is not alone the inhabitants of the Territory who are interested in the question of the admission of a State into the Union, it is not that we should consult their caprices or their whims or their peculiar views or their local interests upon the question of the admission of a State. The reverse is the doctrine, that upon the question of the admission of a State we are executing a trust in behalf of the citizens of the other States, and that on all questions, whether they be political, religious, social, or questions affecting the public order, it is the duty of the representatives of the States already in the Union to protect and safeguard those States against any evil influences which may be introduced into our system of government by the admission of a State.

That has always been the true Democratic doctrine. The argument has always been that it was a trust, for the reason that the territory has been acquired by the common pulse and by the common blood of the States of the Union, and therefore it is their property and it is their interest which must be safe-guarded as much as it is the interest of the inhabitants of the particular Territory which is to be admitted into the Union.

There was a fundamental condition imposed upon the State of Missouri before she could be admitted as a State into the Union The constitution of Missouri, under which that State applied for admission into the Union, provided that it should be the duty of the Legislature—

To pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in the State, under any pretext whatever.

One ground of objection to the admission of the State under this constitution was that it would require the Legislature to exclude free persons of color who would be entitled, under the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, not only to come within the State, but to enjoy there the privileges and immunities of citizens. The resolution of Congress admitting the State was upon the fundamental condition—

That the constitution of Missouri shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

That is to say, the condition of the admission of the State of Missouri was that the State of Missouri should not have the power to decide whether a free negro or a mulatto was a citizen of one of the other States, and therefore she could not speak. So it was in reference to the Missouri compromise. There was a fundamental condition attached to every inch and foot of that Territory, and indelibly fixed upon every inhabitant of that Territory, that north of latitude 36° 30′ there should not be slavery in that Territory, and that States formed out of that Territory should come in as free States. That was a condition which was the basis of the political action of this Government until it was set aside in the Dred Scott decision.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to ask the Senator in reference to the declaration he made just now as to the opinion of the great leaders of the Democratic party. Has he in his researches discovered any assertion by Congress or any assertion by any Democratic leader or any other leader in this country of the right to prescribe to a State on its admission conditions, except such as were intended to prevent the invasion of the fundamental principles of republican liberty and equal rights, or the invasion of the privileges of citizens of the United States guaranteed in the Constitution itself? The case he has cited is a case where Congress made it a condition that, whatever should be its constitution, Missouri should not deny to citizens of the United States those privileges and immunities in Missouri which the Constitution secures to all citizens.

Can the Senator mention a single declaration of any Democratic leader in the past, or of any Congress, to the effect "we will determine that certain local arrangements, either as to the right of suffrage or as to any other form of legislation, shall be made by the people of a Territory." I concede that they have said you shall provide for the education of your citizens, for that is essential to republican liberty; they have said you shall not deny to citizens their equality of right, for that is essential to republican liberty; they shall have those great safeguards and securities which the bill of rights in England and all constitutions and bills of rights in this country declare are essential, the equality of citizenship in a republican government. In other words, the Constitution itself makes it our duty to see to it not merely when the State is admitted but throughout its whole history that its institutions shall be republican in form.

Mr. EUSTIS. Of course it is entirely superfluous to make the condition of the admission of a State that it shall not violate the Constitution of the United States. That it can not do.

Mr. HOAR. But my question is, Has the Senate any authority to the effect stated?

Mr. EUSTIS. The case that I cited, the case of Missouri, goes a little further than what the Senator from Massachusetts apprehends. It was not a legislative act incorporating a provision of the Constitution of the United States. What good would that do? The Constitution of the United States is in force. But it was to deprive the State of Missouri of the power of deciding and of determining that a mulatto or a negro was not a citizen of another State. The Constitution of the United States secures the rights and immunities of citizens of the different States; but who decides who are citizens of the different States? It was upon that fundamental condition of the admission of the State of Missouri that Missouri surrendered the power of determining whether a colored man was a citizen or not under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Was not that to secure to all citizens of the United States their constitutional rights in Missouri notwithstanding any attempt of Missouri to deprive them of them? In other words, it was for the purpose of securing the republican equality which our Constitution contemplates. But is there any single instance known to the Senator, either of an act of Congress or a declaration of a leader of his own party in the past, of a right to say, "We think it better for your local arrangements in the future that your suffrage shall be regulated in a particular way," except as it regards the violation of the inalienable rights of man?

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not say with reference to the question of suffrage that there has ever been any condition.

Mr. HOAR. Has there been in reference to any other question?

Mr. EUSTIS. I cited to the honorable Senator the case of the Missouri compromise, where the question was settled that Congress had the power and did exercise that power of excluding slavery in the territory of Louisiana north of 36° 30′, and that was a fundamental condition of the admission of States within that territory.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator will now concede, whatever he may have thought in the past, that the great leaders of his party did not agree with him that slavery was a violation of fundamental human rights.

Mr. EUSTIS. That is a question I do not propose to enter into.

Mr. HOAR. That is all there was in the Missouri bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I have offered this amendment because I have clear and strong convictions on this question. I believe that it is a question which affects the social relations and the public order of this community; and so believing, to the extent to which my influence can be exerted it shall always be to retain the institutions of this Government such as they are; and inasmuch as no State in this Union has yet adopted this new idea of conferring suffrage upon the female citizens of the country, inasmuch as the act of the Government of the United States, as expressed by its legislation, has never favored or countenanced that innovation, I believe that it is wise and prudent and statesmanlike to preserve and protect the institutions under which we are living, without any dangerous experiment such as is proposed by this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not trespass long on the time of the Senate, but I desire to call the attention especially of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the act to establish the Territorial government of Washington, approved March 2, 1853. I find in the fifth section of that act the following:

That every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, and shall possess the qualifications hereinafter prescribed, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office at all subsequent elections shall be such as shall be prescribed by the legislative assembly: Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years.

This is the particular provision to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky:

And those above that age who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.

So that the point made by the Senator from Kentucky in regard to the provisions of the law of the Territorial Legislature has no force whatever. That right was conferred upon the organization of Washington as a Territory. Now what is the session act of that Territory November 23, 1883?

All American citizens above the age of twenty-one years, and all American half-breeds over that age who have adopted the habits of the whites, and all other inhabitants of this Territory above that age who shall have declared on oath their intentions to become citizens at least six months previous to the day of election, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the organic act of this Territory at least six months previous to the day of election, and who shall have resided six months in the Territory and thirty days in the county next preceding the day of election, and none other, shall be entitled to hold office or vote at any election in this Territory.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I desire to send him a statute that I think he ought to call attention to in that connection. It is the act creating a Territorial government for the Territory of Oregon, which included Washington; that is to say, Washington was carved out of Oregon. The act was approved August 14, 1848, and the provisions in regard to the voters of the Territory are the same identically. I have marked the act. It antedates that which the Senator has read by a number of years.

Mr. BUTLER. In the second section of the act of the Territorial Legislature of Washington is the following language:

Wherever the word "his" occurs in the chapter aforesaid it shall be construed to mean "his" or "her," as the case may be.

Those are the qualified electors referred to in this enabling act in the third section. That is as far as it goes, and I confess that I have not quite felt the force of the argument of my friend from Louisiana, which is that while the people within the limits prescribed by this enabling act known as Washington Territory were in their state of Territorial pupilage, while they were under the control of Congress exercising all the rights and powers and jurisdiction and supervision over the inhabitants there, it was quite innocent for them to indulge in cranky notions, in isms, as to mere municipal regulations, as to Territorial matters, yet when you come to the exercise of the highest right of sovereignty, the organizing of a State government, then Congress is to come in and say, "We will discipline you." When they are in the act of passing from that state of Territorial existence into a sovereign State, a commonwealth of this country on terms of equality with the other States of the Union, then, says the Senator from Louisiana, Congress must come in and discipline you a little.

Mr. President, I submit that it does not become the Congress of the United States, after having approved for three years this provision of law passed by the Territorial Legislature, at this late day, when these people are knocking at the door of the Union, to tell them, "Although we have acquiesced in these cranky notions and isms," as the Senator calls them, "for three years, now that you are going to prepare yourself for Statehood in the Union, we will take you by the throat and say you shall only do it upon certain conditions." Of course, Congress has the right to impose fundamental conditions; nobody denies that; and this very act imposes a fundamental condition, and what is it?

Provided, nevertheless, That such constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil and political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

That is the fundamental condition imposed by this act on the people of Washington Territory, and I submit that it is the only fundamental condition in the present state of affairs in this country that Congress has a right to impose.

I admit without any hesitation that while these people are in a Territorial condition Congress has the right to say "You shall pass laws, but such laws as you may pass shall not prevail and become valid without our consent;" and if Congress had done its duty in that respect we should not to-day be confronted with the most difficult and enormous problem that this country has ever been confronted with since the problem of slavery. I refer to the practices in the Territory of Utah of polygamy. If Congress had acted promptly, as it should have done, and said to those people, "You must extirpate this crime," it would have been settled years ago; but instead of that we allowed it to go on from year to year; and from year to year it grew in magnitude, in power, in influence, in intelligence, in wealth, and now Congress attempts to throttle it; and in what condition does it find itself? Of course Congress would have the right if Utah were applying for admission to say that before you come in you must extirpate this crime from your statute-book and your customs and your institutions. Congress would have the right to do that.

But opposed as I am to the principle of woman suffrage, I do not and can not be brought to believe that that is a crime, and I would prefer to preserve as far as may be the autonomy of this organization in its transition state from a Territory to a sovereign commonwealth in this Union, and hence it is that I shall vote against the amendment of my friend from Louisiana.

I want to say now while I am on my feet that, opposed as I am to woman suffrage, there might be very many greater evils in this country than conferring the right of suffrage upon some of the mothers of this land. There might be a greater calamity to social order, to the prosperity, the happiness, the well-being of the people of this country than the conferring of the right of suffrage upon some of the mothers of the land.

My friend says that the institutions of this country were built up upon and are maintained by manhood suffrage. I believe, sir, that many of the evils of this country have arisen and will continue to arise by reason of that very institution of universal manhood suffrage; and there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States, or in the two recent amendments to it, the fourteenth and fifteenth, which limits or prevents any State in this Union from imposing any qualification upon its voters except this, that when a State shall impose qualifications it shall apply those qualifications to all alike, and shall not discriminate on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude. That is the only limitation. Massachusetts may to-morrow, Vermont may to-morrow if her Legislature were in session impose just such qualifications as she pleases upon her voters, provided she does not discriminate on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude. That is the only limitation upon a State by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

Now, sir, what would be the effect, according to the admission of the Senator from Louisiana, of the adoption of his amendment? He does not deny that in two months after the President of the United States issued his proclamation admitting this State into the Union the people of the State might call a convention and adopt female suffrage, and I should like to see Congress put its hand upon it then.

Mr. EUSTIS. They might not do it; they might follow the advice of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, they might not do it; but they certainly will have the power to do it on becoming a sovereign State. Will the Senator from Louisiana deny that his own State at the next meeting of its Legislature may call a convention, and that that convention may confer the right of suffrage on women? Certainly not; he is too good a States' right man for that. Then what am I asked to put into this enabling act? This act is not, I submit, the declaring by Congress of any fundamental law; it simply confers upon the people of Washington Territory the right to organize a State government and declare the fundamental law of that State subject only to its being republican in form and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. So I can see no practical advantage in adopting the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana; for, as I said, according to his own admission, the people of that Territory, becoming a State, may meet the next day, if it were practicable and possible, and adopt female suffrage.

It is not for me to say, it is not I submit for Congress to say, what shall be the qualifications of the electors in that State. I am a believer in the right of the people to regulate their own affairs in their own way, subject only to the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States; and if they have seen fit to adopt female suffrage, it is their affair and not mine and not the affair of Congress, I submit. What would the Senator from Louisiana think if this Congress were to attempt to interfere with the right of suffrage in his own State beyond that authorized by the fifteenth amendment?

So, sir, I think the bugbear held up by the Senator from Kentucky of the danger of placing the ballot in the hands of the colored women of the South was put up simply for effect. If I were the most ardent female suffragist in this country, I should be very far from conferring the right of suffrage upon all the women. I would impose certain qualifications, and if I had the right to-morrow to confer suffrage anew upon the males of this country, I should be very far from conferring it upon every man. I have no hesitation in saying that universal suffrage as established by the reconstruction laws in the South, with almost universal ignorance in the class exercising that right, has kept that section upon a volcano, which I hope and believe we are happily passing from. I would not confer the right upon every man twenty-one years old to vote if I had the power to confer it to-morrow; and I have no hesitation in saying further, that if I had the power in my own State I would restrict the right of suffrage, because I believe society, property, life, and the happiness of the people would be immensely enhanced by proper restriction in that regard.

Sir, we have discussed to-day in this body the question of the right of Washington Territory to admission into the Union. I think every Senator upon this floor is satisfied that she has all the qualifications necessary for a State, and whether she is Democratic or Republican I can not stop to inquire. She represents an immense area of the finest portion of this continent, with a people intelligent, progressive, law-abiding, and loyal, a population quite sufficient for one Representative in the lower House of Congress, with all the essential qualities necessary to conduct an orderly community. Then why stop and interfere with the right of those people just as they are getting out of the condition of dependence on Congress and being transferred into a state of independence, and undertake to discipline them now and hamper them in the exercise of those sovereign rights which are so essential to the preservation of American liberty and free institutions all over this land?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina read the provision in the act organizing Washington Territory in reference to the qualifications of voters. He did not elaborate it quite as fully as I should have been glad to have heard him do, and I want to call his attention to it. I hold in my hand now the act organizing the Territory of Oregon, which was sent over by the Senator from Oregon and which he said was in the same language. It seems to me that this provision in the act organizing the Territory expressly gives to the Territorial Legislature the power to establish female suffrage if it thinks proper to do so. It reads thus:

That every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act and shall possess the qualifications hereinafter prescribed, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory.

It is very clear, therefore, that at the first election nobody could be a voter unless he was a white male inhabitant twenty-one years of age, but the statute proceeds further to declare:

But the qualifications of voters and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly.

There is nothing there about male inhabitants or inhabitants twenty-one years of age, or white inhabitants, but it leaves the Legislative Assembly with full power to prescribe the qualifications of voters, with this proviso:

Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, and those above that age who shall have declared, on oath, their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.

Including those recognized as citizens by the treaty with the Republic of Mexico concluded February 2, 1848. If a female is a citizen of the United States there is nothing in that statute which prohibits the Legislature of the Territory from making her a voter. I take it, therefore, that the act of Congress which organized the Territory conferred on the Legislature, after the first election, the power to regulate suffrage. They have done so under the authority of this act of Congress, and having acted in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress, I do not think any just point can be made against female suffrage in the Territory on that account.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I do not know how long since Washington Territory by the Territorial Legislature adopted female suffrage. Three years, some one says. Then the Congress of the United States have had three years during which they could have disapproved of that legislation had they desired to do so. I have not had an opportunity to look into the term during which female suffrage has existed in Wyoming; but however long or however short, the Congress of the United States has had undisputed power to control that question.

Mr. PLATT. Some twelve or fifteen years.

Mr. VOORHEES. For twelve or fifteen years, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests. Now it does seem to me that at this last and late hour when a Territory is emerging, as we think and as we hope and as we intend in this legislation, from the condition of a Territory into that of a State, it is hardly worth while to stop and fix the question of the right of citizens to vote in that Territory.

I am not for female suffrage per se, and yet it is one of the great unsolved problems of the future. It is very difficult to meet the arguments by which the right of the people based upon their virtue and intelligence shall exclude women from the ballot; and yet I am not satisfied to embrace the proposition at the present time. It was Edmund Burke, one of the wisest and most thoughtful men that ever lived, who said that statesmanship consisted in the science of circumstances; and so I think of this great question. Circumstances may arise in the future when it will be not only policy but statesmanship to allow those who own property and are interested in good morals, law, and order to exercise the ballot. I do not think the time has arrived as yet, and consequently I have been holding my judgment in abeyance. But however my judgment may be upon that subject, I am clear upon this subject, that at this late hour in the existence of the Territory, when it is about parting from its former condition and putting on the robes of a State, we should not commence dictating in its last hours as a Territory, when we know, as the eloquent and gifted Senator from Louisiana has admitted, that the very moment, within the next hour after its admission as a State, it has supreme and absolute and unquestioned control over the question. Why stop now to determine what they will determine very soon.

There is no objection to the admission of Washington Territory either here or in the other branch of Congress. She has more votes than on an average filled half the seats that are occupied in the other House at this time. Her wealth and her capacity are unquestioned and unchallenged to a degree that is very unusual—to such a degree that I do not know of or apprehend one vote against her admission here. Consequently I have the right to say that she is laying off her pupilage, her probationary raiment, and putting on her garb as a State; and when she does assume her Statehood, that moment this question passes from your power and mine, passes from every other power except her own; and it does seem to me that to raise such an issue at this time is sticking in the bark. Had it been thought by the Congress of the United States important to arrest female suffrage, three years it has been challenging our attention in Washington Territory and more than ten years in Wyoming; and as we have slept on the question, why raise it now? I am as far from imposing female suffrage on the ignorant class of the South as the accomplished Senator from Louisiana himself; but it is taking an occasion, which the great dignity and importance of the subject seem to me not to warrant, to impose it upon the attention of the Senate at this time.

The situation is simply this: Washington Territory and other Territories have made laws prescribing the right of suffrage within their boundaries, and the Congress of the United States has quietly and approvingly not merely submitted to but sanctioned all that they have done. I can see no reason why at this critical hour, so far as Washington Territory is concerned, we should undo what we by our sanction have done. We by our tacit action here have sanctioned female suffrage in Washington Territory. Your States in the South where you fear this question will have the absolute control of it; and it does seem to me that in the interest of State rights we should not seek to impair them as to Territories passing from one condition to another.

I hope this amendment, however much it would gratify my friend from Louisiana, will not receive the sanction of the Senate, and that the question of suffrage will be left, as it has been to every other State, to the State of Washington soon to take her place on the flag of this country, for her to prescribe in the interest of every race, black and white, male and female; and in saying this I speak for a higher principle than mere class or section.

I have said, Mr. President, all I desire to say, and yet I am reluctant to leave the floor before I shall again say that I look upon the problem of female suffrage as one that is to be faced in the future and faced candidly and with intelligence and with justice.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, and I think we should be committing ourselves to a very dangerous proposition by sustaining that amendment.

There are two questions in regard to the exercise of the powers conferred upon us. One is the fact whether we have a specified power or not, and the other is its rightful exercise. There is no doubt, as the Senator from Louisiana has said, that Congress may refuse to exercise the power of admitting a State for all time. Then the question comes: How shall we rightfully exercise the power? Certainly it must be for ends in conformity with the Constitution of the country, and its principles and its public policy.

And what is the great principle of the Constitution upon which the State of Louisiana and the State of New York and the State of Vermont and the State of Delaware, small and great, depend for their protection? It is the principle of the right of local self-government, the right of the people of those States to determine for themselves what shall be their domestic relations, their right of suffrage, their qualifications for office. If that be a principle, a policy, if it be right for one community why is it not right for another? Abstractly, so far as regards the principle, there is nothing in the mere fact of certain boundaries and certain localities having a defined and recognized right to the principle. It is a principle, the principle of local self-government which we declare to be expedient for all people, and by what rightful exercise of power will you deny that to the people of Washington or the people of any other Territory? It is not a question of power. We admit power, but we ask how can we reasonably affirm that a principle of government which we declare is the only safe one for all communities, and the corner-stone of our own Government, is not also good for the people of Washington? We can not properly exercise this power of admitting a new State adversely to this principle, because it is the policy of the law, the principle of the law, not because of any particular fitness in the people of any locality, community, or State, but because we have declared that each community can better manage that which is local to them than the people of other communities.

We have nothing to do with the question of female suffrage. Congress can exercise no power in regard to that. It is remitted by the principle of our institutions and the precepts of the Constitution to the people of the States, and by analogy to the people of the Territories while in a Territorial condition, because Congress, although having ample power over it, has not sought to prescribe the form and the manner in which the power shall be exercised by the Territories, but has left that properly to them, because we maintain the great principle of local self-government to be the only proper form of government for domestic matters.

The Senator from Louisiana said that by refusing to adopt this amendment and by passing this enabling act we should confer the right of suffrage upon the women of Washington Territory. But the Congress of the United States in its organic act gave to them and to their Legislature the power to prescribe the qualification of suffrage at all subsequent elections after the first. Here it is in the organic act. Certainly whatever was done under this act mediately was done by Congress, and became the act of Congress. And yet Congress did not establish woman suffrage any more than they established polygamy in Utah when they said to both Territories in their organic act: "The principle of local self-government is good for you as for us, and we confer this power over you, reserving to ourselves the power to supervise, restrain, and control your exercise of this power." Congress declared in the first instance male inhabitancy and citizenship of the United States to be the qualifications, but said that after the first election and for all subsequent elections they might make the qualification anything else, provided only that citizenship of the United States should still be a condition of suffrage.

The provision of the act of Congress is as follows:

But the qualifications of voters and of holding office at all subsequent elections—

After the first—

shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly.

This is a subsequent election in that Territory, and the organic act passed by the Congress of the United States has given that Territory the right to prescribe female suffrage; and the question now propounded by the Senator from Louisiana is shall we attempt to control and direct the power of that Territory when it becomes a State, taking away from those people the rights that have been conferred upon them under this previous organic act? Sir, the principle of local self-government is far more important than any other principle. It is the foundation-stone of all our institutions and the protection of all our rights; and by the side of it female suffrage is as nothing.

In some States it may be and would be a great public evil; in other States whether wise or unwise its effect would be very different. We are not now required to express any opinion on the subject. But be it bad or be it good, it bears no comparison to the great importance of that pillar and foundation-stone of this Government—the right of the States and the expediency and wisdom of the public policy that the people in all localities should prescribe the laws by which they shall be governed in the local and domestic relations which they shall bear to each other. Therefore, sir, I have no hesitation in voting against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, recognizing the fact that as a question of power our control over the subject is ample and absolute, and that everything done in the Territory or new State in some sense derives its authority from us.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. I ask how he takes a distinction between the policy of Congress when organizing a Territory it provides in the organic act that suffrage shall be confined to those of the male sex alone, and in attempting to organize a State out of that Territory then prescribing in the enabling act that suffrage shall be confined to males? As I understand him, the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Washington did prescribe that the right of suffrage at the first election, so far as Congress attempted to prescribe the right of suffrage at all, should be confined to the male sex. Now when Congress is called upon again to interfere and prescribe a right of suffrage there is it not doing precisely the same thing and following out the same policy again to prescribe that the voters shall be male citizens?

Mr. CALL. There is no difference between the exercise of the power. There is no question about that.

Mr. GRAY. Then how does Congress interfere with the rights of self-government by making such a provision in the act of admission? The bill now before Congress may provide that males only shall exercise the right of suffrage.

Mr. CALL. There is no difference in the act of power. Congress exercises the same power when it prescribes that the qualifications of suffrage shall be confined to male inhabitants in a Territory, and when it shall prescribe it in the organization of a State. But what is the question propounded? We say that every community should have the right to govern itself except in those matters which by the Constitution of the United States are matters of general and national interest. It certainly contravenes that principle for Congress to prescribe that a Territory shall only have male suffrage during its Territorial existence; and it did not do so in Washington Territory. It said that in the very first election alone male inhabitancy should be the qualification and that therefore the Territory could prescibe either female or male inhabitancy or any other qualification.

Now this amendment is an impractical and useless one, because, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, if to-morrow the Territory of Washington, being a State under the power conferred by this enabling act of Congress, should establish female suffrage, Congress could not interfere. Then of what avail is it to us to contradict the very principle upon which we create the State, and say to her, you shall have the power to prescribe the qualifications of suffrage, to establish your own domestic institutions, to do everything; but yet, in the inception of power, we say to you that only a certain class of your citizens shall vote, and you shall not have the right to say what portion of that inhabitancy shall vote.

I say, therefore, it is not only illogical, but it is impracticable and of no avail. Whatever may be the opinion of any person in regard to female suffrage, it has no force or effect in relation to this question.

I wish further to say, Mr. President, in reference to what was said by the Senator from Kentucky this morning, that to no one except the inhabitants of a Territory, being citizens of the United States, can be given the power to organize a State. They are the proper persons; and while the Constitution of the United States can invite immigration from abroad and the people of the locality see fit to establish their own conditions of suffrage, I see no reason whatever to question the propriety of allowing such people as that Territory, being competent in point of numbers, character, and intelligence, see fit to allow to vote, subject always to their being citizens of the United States. I see no reason to fear that the people will extend the suffrage to those who are not citizens. It is probably a sound proposition that in no State should any one vote who is not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, it does not occur to me that the question is exactly fairly stated here. It does not occur to me that the question submitted is as to whether the people of this Territory shall be stripped of or denied their conceded right to determine the qualification of voters. It seems to me that this bill as it is presented submits another and an altogether different question, and that is as to whether the Congress of the United States shall undertake to confer the right of suffrage upon the women inhabitants of Washington Territory. When the Territory was organized Congress prescribed the conditions and qualifications of voters, and limited the suffrage to the male inhabitants, at the first election I admit. For what? To voice and declare the purpose that Congress had, not to legislate upon the question of female suffrage, but to leave the inhabitants of that Territory free and untrameled to determine for themselves, even in their Territorial condition, whether the right of suffrage should be extended to the other sex or not.

Now, it is proposed that Congress shall depart from the rule that was adopted and established, one which is without precedent in the history of this Government, and not leave the people of the Territory or the people of the incoming State to say, but that Congress itself shall say that the Territorial law, as existing to-day, shall be accepted and remain in force and clothe the women of that Territory or incoming State with a power that never was given by Congressional action before. I would be the last man to deny to the people of any State that was admitted to this Union the right to determine the qualification of its voters; but I insist that the people of that State must determine, and not the Congress of the United States. There is no precedent for it, and in my judgment—I say it with all due respect—there is no logic in it.

Suppose that the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana should be adopted. Suppose that that feature of this bill to which it applies should be stricken out, and the Territory of Washington should be admitted into this Union as a State to-morrow. The power of the people of this newly made State is unimpaired and full and perfect, either to confer or to withhold the right of suffrage from its women inhabitants. There is to be no privilege and no right withheld from that people. It is not here proposed by the Senator from Louisiana to deny to the citizens of the new State of Washington the right to prescribe the qualification of its voters. I do not understand that that is either his purpose or the result of his pending amendment. Upon the contrary it is simply to establish and to emphasize the fact that that power belongs to the people of the new State, and not to Congress, and we have no rightful authority over it.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator from Louisiana—perhaps he did not formulate it in this particular amendment—but I understood him to say that he proposed to amend this bill so as to make it a fundamental condition of the entrance of the new State into the Union as a State that it never should confer the suffrage on females.

Mr. EUSTIS. Not that the people of the State never should confer it, but simply making the condition that the constitution presented under this act should limit the right of suffrage to male citizens.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon of the Senator from Kentucky; I want to understand the Senator from Louisiana. I understood he went further than to prescribe what citizens should vote upon the adoption of this constitution, and that it should be a fundamental condition of the constitution itself that there shall be no female suffrage in Washington.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from Massachusetts presents a point that I was not addressing myself to. I simply meant to stand upon this proposition: That the bill now pending before the Senate, in my judgment, should not commit us to a policy that is without precedent and, in my best judgment, without logic to support it. If the people of this Territory desire female suffrage, it is within their power, within twenty-four hours after their admission, if their Legislature be in session, to confer that right; and I will not undertake to abridge or deny it.

If the people of Washington Territory, when that Territory shall be admitted as a State, confer the right of suffrage upon its women I will not be the man to open my mouth or utter one word of protest. But I do insist that it is not the legitimate business of this Congress to do that. I do insist that if you pass this bill in its present shape it is an abandonment of the policy that you have adopted, because in the Territorial organization act you did not give the right which this bill now proposes to confer. It is variant from former legislation; it is a clear departure from all precedent and from all practice. What the Senator from Louisiana proposes is no infringement of the rights of the people of this new State, because we all agree that the very instant the State is admitted its power is absolute to determine this question for itself.

It took a special act of Congress to confer upon that Territorial people the right to do what they did when by their Legislature they conferred suffrage upon females. It will not take an act of Congress to confer that power upon those same people when the Territory is admitted as a State. It then holds that right because of its own State sovereignty. And the only question submitted here, in my judgment, is as to whether you will leave the people of the new State of Washington to determine this question and confer this right if they please, or whether in the face of the precedents and against all reason the Congress of the United States will undertake to confer it.

I have no objection to the admission of this new Territory into the sisterhood of States, but I can not gain my own consent and I never will agree to vote for any bill that looks to the admission of any Territory as a State in this Union that commits the Federal Congress to a usurpation of power that does not belong to it, and deprives to that extent the people of this new-fledged State of their own right of sovereignty.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, all the speeches that have been made on this subject seem to me to be danger-signals in regard to a suggestion that I made in the remarks I had the honor to submit to the Senate on this bill several days ago. They are danger-signals that we are about to create a State and give it a constitution by a sort of process of entailment. The child is not yet born. The father is making out his will or his deed, and he is describing that, upon the coming into existence of a certain heir, that child shall have certain rights, certain constitutional powers and functions, certain great enjoyments of liberty and privileges, &c. We do not define them in the deed as we should do; we do not know to-day what the constitution of the State of Washington is to be. It is not a subject that the Senate of the United States can debate, because we have not the scratch of a pen to show what that constitution may be. We are acting entirely on the faith of the idea that it will be republican in form and that it will contain three or four provisions which we require in this act that it shall contain.

Mr. President, that is very hasty and very unnecessary legislation in bringing a State into the American Union, and these questions which have been mooted here—and this question is only one of a number that might arise in the formation of the constitution—ought to admonish us that in the admission of States into this Union we should go back to the original doctrine; and, as I remarked when I was on the floor before on this bill, the precedent that was established in the admission of the State of Alabama and all the other States, except, I believe, Colorado and Nevada, ought to be followed in this case. The ninth section of the enabling act for the State of Alabama is as follows:

> That in case the said convention shall form a constitution and State government for the people of the Territory of Alabama, the said convention, as soon thereafter as may be, shall cause a true and attested copy of such constitution or frame of government as shall be formed or provided to be transmitted to Congress for its approbation.

Will any man deny that that is the safest plan to operate upon in admitting States into the American Union? The doctrine of squatter sovereignty is spoken of here, of local government, of the sovereignty and power of the people of a State or of a locality, a commonwealth that is about to frame a constitution with a view to being admitted as a State. How far does that doctrine extend? Let me call the attention of the Senate to one question in connection with it. Does it extend to include those people who, at the time of the adoption of a constitution or at the time of voting for delegates for a constitutional convention, are not citizens of the United States? Some Senator says "certainly not."

Could the Legislature of Washington Territory after we have passed this bill enact a law under its provisions fixing the qualifications of voters so that Chinamen, who can not be naturalized under the laws of the United States, might become qualified voters to elect delegates to that constitutional convention? Could they enact a law that boys fourteen years old, many of whom have as much intelligence as many men of forty years of age, should be qualified voters to elect delegates and to adopt that constitution? Can they in virtue of this supposed local sovereignty violate all the rules and precedents that have obtained heretofore in the organization of local governments in converting Territories into States? I need not argue a proposition of that kind before the Senate of the United States, for while I can not cite you in the Constitution any prohibition against a local community adopting such suffrage as that, I can show you, as the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has well remarked this evening, every precedent in favor of the opposing view.

Therefore in considering as we are doing to-day what persons whom we shall empower to elect delegates and also to vote upon the constitution when it is adopted, we must follow the precedents that have been established in the Congress of the United States hitherto and in all the governments of the United States, or else we must depart from them. The safer rule, of course, is to follow the precedents. They have become the unwritten law of the United States; the law of the land whether written in a constitution or in a statute, or not. They are the laws expressed in the solemn judgment of all the constitutional conventions that have adopted State constitutions and in the convention also which adopted the Constitution of the United States.

We must have respect for those laws. This bill does not have any respect for them. This bill abandons them all. This bill, instead of leading us to the traditional boundaries which have been followed uniformly everywhere in the United States, commits us to certain acts of Territorial legislation which prescribe in a very peculiar and new form the qualifications of electors in the Territory of Washington.

As I understood the reading of the Territorial statute to-day by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in reference to the qualification of voters in Washington Territory, persons twenty-one years of age who are citizens of the United States, persons of alien birth who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States and have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and half-breed Indians are the electors in the Territory of Washington. That is a new departure in regard to the Indians. This bill says that all the persons who are authorized under the laws of the Territory of Washington to vote, except Indians not taxed, are the qualified electors to choose delegates to the constitutional convention, and also to vote on the ratification of that constitution.

There is a repeal by this act of Congress of the act of the Territorial Legislature in respect to Indians, for we have nothing here to show that half-breed Indians are all taxed. Indeed I doubt the power of the Territory of Washington to tax an Indian. Under our laws and Constitution it is a very questionable power whether an Indian can be taxed in that Territory. But suppose he is a half-breed and a member of a tribe, then we know he can not be taxed. The intercourse laws prohibit it, and in many instances the treaties themselves would exclude the power; and yet here now Congress in passing this bill repeals the law of Washington Territory in that respect.

The Senator from Lousiana asks you to repeal another part of that law, or rather to establish a law which in its nature and effect repeals another part of it, and a great clamor is made about it. In the one case it is an Indian that is excluded; in the other case it is a woman who is let in to vote. I suppose it is the courtesy and gallantry of the Senate that must be appealed to to make this deviation from principle in the enactment that we have proposed here.

Mr. President, there is another difficulty in this case. Women are allowed to vote by express provisions of the statutes of Washington Territory. A woman twenty-one years of age, married or unmarried, is entitled to the right of suffrage in that Territory, and yet when you come to look at the naturalization laws of the United States it is not necessary that a woman should be naturalized to give her all the rights of citizenship under the acts of Congress as expounded in 7 Wallace, in the case of Kelly vs. Dohan. A woman who is an alien, an Irish woman who marries a naturalized Irishman in Washington Territory, or who marries a native citizen of Washington Territory, becomes in virtue of that act a naturalized citizen of the United States without the necessity of taking any oath whatsoever to support the Constitution.

I will suppose an election is about to be held in Washington Territory under this bill to elect delegates to the constitutional convention. The election is to be held to-morrow. To-day a lady who never before was in Washington Territory comes from abroad, comes from Ireland, and she marries a native citizen of the United States. Thereupon she becomes entitled to vote because she is a woman. Her husband is entitled to vote because he is a native-born American. If her husband were an Irishman who had been naturalized or who had filed his papers declaring his intention to become naturalized, he would be entitled to vote on the performance of those conditions, one of which that he was naturalized, and the other that he had filed his papers of intention; and here is the wife entitled to vote because she is a woman and is naturalized by reason of the fact that she marries a man who is a native citizen, though she may not have been in the Territory three days before the time for voting arrives.

There is a great deal of uncertainty about this. I would rather the question had not been raised, so far as I am concerned, for I am extremely anxious that Washington Territory should be admitted into the Union, but I suggest, as I remarked when I first took the floor on this bill, that it is hasty and unwise legislation to have this State brought into the brotherhood of States until Congress shall have had an opportunity of passing upon the Constitution and giving to it its approbation, and it is extremely unsafe to take any other course. I suggested the case of Utah.

Lay your precedent down here and wait perhaps twenty or thirty years, until the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has been carried to his fathers above, and when his voice and power in the Senate are no longer here to influence and control us, perhaps—lay this precedent down and let polygamy run riot in Utah Territory, and let some great political power have a necessity for the three or more votes that would come from that State if admitted into the Union, and she comes here without any constitution, comes here with a body of people, men and women, entitled to vote under the Territorial statutes, and they demand that because the laws of Utah have qualified certain persons as voters there, they shall have the same advantage of coming into the American Union that Washington Territory now has.

There is your precedent, and you have got to accuse a whole people of such criminality as that they are not entitled to come into the Union at all, or else you have got to admit Utah upon the principle that you are establishing in Washington Territory by the proclamation of a President who may be seeking a second election and who by his proclamation may bring three votes to his side of the case just in time to make him President again.

Sir, it is a reckless abuse of power by Congress to go headlong into the admission of a State into the Union, a total abandonment of correct principles, dangerous in the last degree. Whoever votes at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention must derive his or her power from this act of Congress. There is no act of the Territorial Legislature that can confer upon any person in Washington Territory the right to elect members to a constitutional convention unless Congress either before or afterward approves and ratifies it. In other words, all the power that is to be exercised by any elector in Washington Territory in the election of delegates is a power derived from an act of Congress, and from no other source.

The honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] says to me there is no doubt about that. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] laid down that Congress had given its consent hitherto to but one qualification of electorship in Washington Territory, and that was that the voter should be a male twenty-one years of age. Now we are fixing another, and if we do not fix it this voter has no power that binds us.

Mr. BUTLER. Does my friend forget the act which I read to the Senate of November, 1883, passed by the Territorial Legislature, conferring on women the right to vote? Congress has not put its seal of disapprobation upon that act.

Mr. MORGAN. The point I take, which the honorable Senator from South Carolina seems not to have noted, is identical with the point taken by the Senator from Kentucky who was last on the floor, that in the organization of a constitution, the election of delegates to a convention, and the voting upon a constitution after it has been framed by that convention, the power of the elector to bind the Government of the United States and to enable the President by a proclamation to bring the State in, must be a power derived, not from the Territorial Legislature, but from Congress. When therefore we enact this bill, it is the same thing as if Congress had taken out of the statutes of Washington Territory, word by word and letter by letter, every clause therein relating to the qualifications of voters and incorporated it into this act, just the same thing.

Now suppose you formulate an amendment to this bill so as to strike out all questions of inference and reference, and you say in the language of the Legislature of Washington Territory, "at this election women shall be entitled to vote; half-breeds shall be entitled to vote; Indians not taxed shall be excluded; foreign-born persons who have come into the Territory and declared their intention of becoming citizens shall vote, whether male or female"—put it in that form, and then admit the premises which are conceded here now that that is the summary of the power which is conferred by Congress upon these people and without which they have no power whatever; we have got the question in its true light. We by passing this bill confer upon the women of Washington Territory the power to pass upon the election of delegates and on the ratification of the constitution.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] said that it was an unhappy thing that these questions were raised at this late hour of the existence of the Territory of Washington just before she was to emerge into a State. Well, it would be unhappy, Mr. President, very unhappy if the Congress of the United States should put it into the power of two sets of officers to create a State without any further examination on its part. Who are they? The officers of that convention whose work is to be ratified by a majority vote of the people, and the President of the United States. When we pass this bill our power over this subject is gone.

No amendment of this bill even will be in order. After we have committed this power into the hands of the Territorial convention and of the President, the whole subject is closed; the State is formed. When this bill is passed and signed by the President of the United States, the Territory of Washington comes into the Union without any further act or consideration on the part of Congress. Her constitution may be this way or that way; it might be in the judgment of the Congress of the United States wholly unrepublican, but if in the judgment of an interested President it might be republican to his satisfaction, that is enough, and the State comes in by a proclamation.

Congress passes its final act; does all it has to do in regard to this matter when this bill is passed; the subject passes from its control. Therefore in shaping this measure there is need to be extremely careful, particularly as it is a mere prospective view, a mere guess, a mere supposition, as to what this constitution possibly may be when it is brought here. There may be so many wild isms and fancies and phantoms occupying the mind of the American people at this time that I should not wonder to see any of them loaded into a new State constitution.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to interrupt him? The Senator from South Carolina asked the Senator from Louisiana how it would do if Congress interfered with the regulation of suffrage in the State of Louisiana. I ask the Senator from Alabama if, as a citizen of the State of Alabama and a member of a convention to form a constitution for the State of Alabama, he regarded it as dangerous to the best interests of the country to admit female suffrage, would he not for the same reason as a citizen of the United States and a Senator of the United States, Congress having the exclusive control of the question of suffrage in the Territories, regard it equally as his duty to vote against a bill according suffrage to that class?

Mr. MORGAN. My duty in a case of that kind would be measured by the nature of the danger, because there are some facts that are accomplished facts in our Government as in all others which were unconstitutional in their beginning and in their execution, but after they become accomplished facts that puts an end to all question. They can not be questioned after they are once accomplished.

Mr. BUTLER. If my friend will pardon me for interrupting him at that point, I wish to say that that is exactly the condition of the question of suffrage in my judgment in Washington Territory. I think I see clearly the point made by himself and the Senator from Louisiana as to Congress conferring qualification on the voters under this bill; but the point I make in reply is that Congress is estopped from making any objection, having committed itself to it for fifteen years in the Territory of Wyoming and three years in the Territory of Washington. That is the reply I have to make to that.

Mr. BROWN. And having conferred upon the Legislature after the first election the right to fix the qualification of voters.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely, and Congress is absolutely estopped. That is an accomplished fact about which the Senator is just speaking; and it is too late, after having approved and acquiesced in it, to come now and say that we are beginning de novo and for the first time conferring these powers upon the electors of that Territory.

Mr. MORGAN. The accomplished fact to which I referred was, for instance, the admission of Colorado and Nevada contrary to what I believe to be a good constitutional policy; and although we might now by one unanimous vote in both Houses pass a resolution that the State of Colorado had been admitted contrary to the Constitution of the United States, still Colorado would be in the Union. The difficulty about female suffrage being an accomplished fact in Washington Territory rests in the fact that Washington Territory is not a State. The States in the American Union have the right to prescribe the qualification of voters. The Territories of the American Union have that right only sub modo, just as we confer the power upon them and no further.

Mr. BUTLER. And that has been done in this case.

Mr. MORGAN. It has not been done in respect of the power we are now conferring, because when we say that this constitution shall be received upon certain conditions one of the conditions which we prescribe is that it shall be the result of a majority vote of the qualified voters in the Territory. Qualified by whom? I say qualified by Congress and not qualified by squatter sovereignty or anything of that kind.

Mr. BROWN. Or by the local Legislature by the authority of Congress.

Mr. GRAY. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Alabama. The great objection to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana that has been urged on this floor is that it in some way contravenes the principle of local self-government, inasmuch as the citizens of Washington Territory have established for themselves a condition of things in which women have the right to vote on all matters connected with the Territory. Now I understand that this bill enabling that Territory to erect itself into a State does not embrace simply the territory now comprised within the limits of Washington Territory, but it includes a portion of the Territory of Idaho; and in that Territory, I am informed, this condition of things does not exist—the right of women to vote. How then are we to regulate our conduct in managing this matter as Senators if we feel trammeled by the principle of local self-government from interfering with citizens in Washington? Are we to have no regard for those who live in the territory that is now a portion of Idaho? Why have not they as much right to be considered, if we are bound to consider the local institutions of the Territories, as the people who live in the present Territory of Washington?

Mr. MORGAN. The point taken by the Senator from Delaware is a very clear one, and I think it is well worthy of consideration. Mr. President, let me read from section 3 of this bill:

> That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified electors resident within said boundaries are hereby authorized, after due proclamation by the governor of Washington Territory, and in conformity to the laws of said Territory relative to the election of members of the Legislative Assembly thereof, as nearly as practicable, and in so far as they may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations, and at such time and places, as said governor may prescribe, to elect as many delegates, possessing the qualifications of such electors within the present limits of said Territory, as there are members of said Legislative Assembly.

And so on. At what time are these qualifications to take effect? Are they qualifications now existing, or qualifications that the Territorial Legislature may impose the day after this bill has become a law? There is nothing in this act to define the period of time in the legislation of the Territory of Washington when the question of what is a qualification is to be determined. Now, in order to test the question of where the power comes from, I will suppose that the Territorial Legislature of Washington, after this bill has become a law, and in view of the fact that an election is to be held for a constitutional convention, repeals the statute authorizing women to vote.

Suppose the Territory of Washington repeals the statute, what would be the effect upon woman suffrage in that Territory? If the Legislature has got the right to prescribe all the qualifications of voters, and if it is to that that we bow in the passage of this law, if we are yielding our authority up to a power that has been hitherto vested in this Territorial Legislature, then it has the right to repeal it, because there is nothing in this bill that says on what particular day or time the qualification shall go into effect, or before or after which it shall not take effect. Therefore if the Territorial Legislature, upon the doctrine assumed by gentlemen here, should, after this bill has passed, repeal woman suffrage in Washington Territory, that would end the right, because there is the assumed sovereign power of controlling electoral qualifications. No, sir; after this act has passed the Territorial Legislature of Washington can not touch it. Why? Because it is an act of Congress, and because the power of the elector is derived from this act and not from the Legislature of the Territory. That is the reason.

Mr. President, there are about 12,000,000 voters in the United States and they represent probably 60,000,000 people. These voters are described in the various constitutions and laws conferring on them their power. In the great majority of the States and Territories throughout the Union the qualification of every voter is that he shall be a man twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States. In some cases they relax it so as to say that a person of foreign birth who has filed his application to become a citizen may be a voter.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to inquire if a white male foreigner who has declared his intention to become a citizen is not a voter in Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I say in a great many of the States.

Mr. DOLPH. And in fifteen out of the thirty-eight States that is also the case.

Mr. MORGAN. Probably so; but very few of the States have female voters. The great rule is the other way. A voter is an officer-holder. He is a man who, in virtue of the fact of his being a person qualified under local constitutions and statutes to vote, holds in trust the power to choose persons to office, and through that power to influence all the machinery of government. There are twelve million of these office-holders, some of them white and some black, no Indians, some females—twelve millions of these officer-holders. They represent sixty millions of people. Only one-fifth of the people of the United States have any voice whatever in this Government.

I do not suppose that we shall ever have universal suffrage in the sense of saying that every man who has sense enough to vote and every child, female or male, shall be admitted to vote, and that a schoolmaster's certificate that he or she can read the Constitution of the United States through and through shall qualify him or her to vote, as would qualify a man twenty-one years of age in Massachusetts and Connecticut. I do not suppose that universal suffrage will ever go to the extent of saying that the suffrage of the country shall be measured only by the intelligence of the people and that we will take the Connecticut or Massachusetts standard and say that degree of intelligence which enables a person to read the constitution of the State is all that is required. There is something else in the holding of this power in trust.

There is something else in the office held by those who are sovereign in this country besides the mere fact that they have intelligence enough to know the difference between the Republican and Democratic parties or to know the difference between the New Testament and a State constitution. Something else is required.

My friends on this side to-day in speaking of the American people spoke of them as sovereigns. Well, they are sovereigns in a large and broad and deep and strong sense; but how many of them are sovereigns? Twelve million out of sixty million. The other four-fifths have no more voice in this Government than if they were citizens of Russia, except their moral influence.

Why have we in vesting the sovereignty of this country adopted the old English rule almost universally, that the powers of electors shall be confided to men and that the men shall be twenty-one years of age? Because the ages are wiser than any generation of men, and we do not dare to depart from the teaching of ages which has brought our race into such wonderful mastery throughout the world. We do not dare to depart from it until we have made a fair and good survey of the ground in every direction to see whether we are not giving up more than we expect to gain. The women were excluded from suffrage in this country not because they were not intelligent, for as a rule they are as intelligent as the men; not because they were disposed to evil, for as a rule they are very far better than the men; and if the cause of Christianity which has accomplished such wonderful triumphs over the country had to be upheld only by the men, we should go back, yes, three centuries in three weeks; the cause of Christianity would be abandoned in the country virtually if it were not for the support that the women give to it.

One honorable Senator spoke of his mother and of the influence that she had exerted over him, and evidently he felt it in his heart as a Senator on the floor of this great assemblage to-day. But, sir, he would not vote to put her here by his side. He would say, "Behold in me the example of your work, of your training, of your fidelity, of your efforts, your talents, your tastes, your skill, and all that, and let me step forward and hold this rugged point of power, this controversial point, and as an officeholder, holding in trust the interests of the mighty people vested in him, let me step forward and become not merely the defender of the principles in which you educated me, but also your personal protector."

Some men in this world may desire to abandon their manhood and take up the functions of the female sex. Let them do it, if they will. In doing so they merely abdicate a power that God has given them and an office that He has imposed upon them. That spirit is rife through this land. Go among your Departments here in Washington city and see the number of elegant educated women who are compelled to resort to the offices here in Washington for their daily bread, applicants for which come with piteous tears and lamentations for the influence and power of men to get them places, and mercy and humanity compel us to do what we can to get them these situations.

There is scarcely a woman in office in Washington to-day whose presence and position have not relieved some man whom I will not here characterize of his honorable duty to give that woman protection and support. It is the want of manhood among the men that is forcing the women of the world to the front. After all, sir, they have a wider field of power in which they exercise greater authority than the men of the world, the men who cast the votes, the men above twenty-one years of age.

We have two forces in this country, each dependent upon the other, and society resting in security upon both. One is the moral power; the other the legal authority. One is the power of government in which the roughest men are to be handled, and through whose instrumentality the battles of nations are to be fought and the great works of labor and enterprise are to be accomplished. The other is the soft, genial influence of the moral force which commences to beam in upon the babe's eyes from the moment that it may see its mother's face, and never deserts it during life, exercising a benign, a happy, a Christian influence over that life, so as to qualify it for the paternal and more awful duties of manhood.

Women in their sphere have a higher duty to perform than we, while we have one that is more rough.

I have the conviction resting in my own heart so deeply that I can not expel it, that when God made me a man He clothed me with a man's duties and a man's powers, and made it my duty, as well as my most prized and blessed privilege, to take care of those who might be dependent upon me in the family relations, who, in their state of tenderness and of weakness, are still stronger and more powerful than I could ever be or expect to be.

Mr. President, we hear it said that it will purify the ballot to allow the women to participate in it. That depends entirely upon the question how long the women will be pure. A ballot corrupted by a bad woman is the most dangerous instrumentality that was ever put into operation. Hence it was that the honorable Senator from Vermont, when he brought his Utah bill in, found that the ballot in the hands of a woman who might be under the influence of a bad man was of such a dangerous character that he felt bound to ask Congress to repeal it—to strike it down.

You put a woman out of her sphere, unsex her, put upon her shoulders the burden of a man's duty, and put into her hands the instrument of a man's power, and you have got a being who has lost caste and character as God made her and intended her to be. You make her masculine, and ten to one you make her ferocious.

The voting of women in this country at the open polls will corrupt women, I do not care what it does to the polls; and I would rather see as a result fifty years of corrupt elections than to see fifty women corrupted by one election. I do not believe that it is right. It is either a sentimentality, or it is a shrinking from duty to call the ladies of this country out of their homes and among their families and ask them to visit the polls and the hustings.

Think of a stump-speaking woman, a woman to get up and to exercise herself in the low-lived business of the pot-house politician! Who can fancy a fate of that sort for his own daughter and not shrink from the contemplation? Who will marshal and parade the women of this country among the men, black and white and red, good and bad, put the ballot in their hands, and have them crowd up to the polls to cast their votes? And who after that would ever feel that he would like to lay his hand upon that woman or call her sister or mother? Some may stand it; there may be some heroic characters among the women who would not be touched by a thing of that sort, but God save the multitude.

We can not keep corruption out of our politics. Corruption has never been kept out of politics of this country or Great Britain, and never will be. But, Mr. President, let us at least limit the number who are to be influenced, and let us not tear the veil of privacy from those true and honest bosoms who will be stung to death by this adder of corruption introduced into politics.

Some Senator to-day referred to Edmund Burke. I happen to have in my pocket just at the moment a little extract from Mr. Burke, in which he described a woman, and that woman was his wife; and to my mind she is only the prototype of the women who surround us through the length and breadth of this land. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

She is handsome, but it is a beauty not arising from features, from complexion, or from shape. She has all three in a high degree, but it is not by these she touches the heart; it is all that sweetness of temper, benevolence, innocence, and sensibility which a face can express that forms her beauty.

She has a face that just raises your attention at first sight; it grows on you every moment, and you wonder it did no more than raise your attention at first.

Her eyes have a mild light, but they awe when she pleases, they command, like a good man out of office, not by authority, but by virtue.

Her stature is not tall; she is made to be the admiration of everybody but the happiness of one.

She has all the firmness that does not exclude delicacy; she has all the softness that does not imply weakness.

Her voice is a soft, low music—not formed to rule in public assemblies, but to charm those who can distinguish a company from a crowd—it has this advantage, you must come close to her to hear it.

To describe her body describes her mind—one is the transcript of the other. Her understanding is not shown in the variety of matters it exerts itself on, but in the goodness of the choice she makes.

She does not display it so much in saying or doing striking things as in avoiding such as she ought not to say or do.

No person of so few years can know the world better, no person was ever less corrupted by the knowledge of it.

Her politeness flows rather from a natural disposition to oblige rather than from any rules on that subject, and therefore never fails to strike those who understand good breeding and those who do not.

She has a steady and firm mind, which takes no more from the solidity of the female character than the solidity of marble does from its polish and luster. She has such virtue as to make us value the truly great of our own sex.

Mr. MORGAN. That picture will be realized by many a Senator on this floor, by many an American citizen, and I believe that there are very few who would have a woman thus described and not overdescribed, transplanted from the seat of power and influence which she naturally enjoys and put to voting among men at the ballot-box. I am for the preservation of the delicacy, the wisdom, the moral force, the great controlling influence of woman; and I am not for degrading her into a common political machine, either to influence others or to be influenced by others. I never want to see a dirty politician enter a gentleman's house with the privilege of sitting down between himself and his wife to discuss politics between the two, to influence the wife to go against the husband. Whoever dissevers that relation or passes a law the consequence of which will be its disseverance inflicts a harm upon his race as well as upon his country.

I desired, Mr. President, to express these views, because I propose to introduce the amendment that I spoke of, to have this constitution brought back here and examined by the Congress of the United States for its approbation; and if we find there that they have put in a clause which can never be repealed or amended, inflicting, as I will say, woman suffrage in perpetuity upon those people, I will be prepared to vote against it. If, however, they say that the people of the State of Washington may amend their constitution so as to put in woman suffrage, or putting it in may amend so as to strike it out, giving them an opportunity after experience to understand the real value of the thing, or that it has no value, I would still vote to approve the constitution, because those people thus drawn into Statehood would have the right to regulate that for themselves.

I will vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Louisiana only to express my opinion upon the subject. After that I expect to introduce the proposition which I announced when I first took the floor on this bill, that this constitution, after it has been adopted, shall be brought back for the consideration of Congress, and that no President of the United States shall have the right to make any Territory into a State.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I am as much opposed to woman suffrage as the Senator from Louisiana or as the Senator from Alabama; but I vote against the amendment because I believe the people of Washington Territory have a right to settle that matter for themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER (when Mr. BOWEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who is not well and is absent. But lest we may fail of a quorum, I ask the Senator from Texas if he be willing to transfer his pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and then the Senator from Texas can vote and I can myself.

Mr. COKE. I am willing to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I vote "nay" and the Senator from Texas is at liberty to vote.

Mr. COKE. I shall do so.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. My colleague is detained from the Senate by indisposition. If he were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with his colleague [Mr. FAIR].

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLIN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is absent from the Senate this afternoon. If he were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. My colleague [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] is out of the Chamber. I am paired with him, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLAIR. My colleague [Mr. PIKE] is absent sick and is paired.

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 24; as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That when the House on this day resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, it shall be in order to take up bills in their order, and, after five minutes' explanation, the question shall be put to the committee whether there is objection to the present consideration of the bill; and if five persons object to its consideration, such bill shall be passed over informally and the next bill shall be taken up for consideration in like manner. Bills to the consideration of which there are not five persons objecting shall be subject to ten minutes' debate, five minutes in favor of the bill and five minutes against it; when the question shall be put upon laying the bill aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice that unless this order be made I have no desire to go on with the Private Calendear, and will not antagonize any general measure that may be called up to-day.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COLE, for two weeks, on account of sickness.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House at an early day the effect and operation of the following provision in section 6 of the act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes:

"A drawback of 75 cents per ton shall be allowed on all bituminous coal imported into the United States which is afterward used for fuel on board of vessels propelled by steam which are engaged in the coasting trade of the United States or in the trade with foreign countries, to be allowed and paid under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe."

Also to further inform this House whether said provision is now being evaded by shipments of coal from Great Britain to American dealers in any manner; also what importations have been made, and what drawbacks have been allowed thereunder, at the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, respectively.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand this is a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury as to the construction of the drawback clause relating to coal.

Mr. HEWITT. Yes, sir. Its adoption is asked for the purpose of information solely.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand, the construction of the clause has been that it applies not only to American but to foreign vessels.

Mr. HEWITT. So I understand. The object is to get information from the Treasury Department as to what has been done.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I have been appealed to on all sides to withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in regard to the method of considering private bills to-day. So far as I am individually concerned, I am willing to do so, in order to see what the effect of this proposed change would be, provided the proposition applies only to to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is only for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. It will be read again, and the Chair will ascertain whether there is further objection.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAULBEE. Are we to understand that this change affects only the business of to-day?

The SPEAKER. That is what the resolution provides.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to the resolution.

JOHN TAGGART.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4115) for the relief of John Taggart, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6394) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885.

The bill was read.

Mr. BEACH. I believe this is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BEACH. I think it had better be considered regularly under the rules, and therefore I shall object.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to make a statement, if the gentleman will permit, reserving his right to object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] whether this bill has been recommended by the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. PERKINS. It was prepared by that officer with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and was sent here by the President with an executive message recommending its passage. Its object is to carry out an act passed by the Forty-eighth Congress pertaining to this same subject. By mistake there was no provision in that act for minor orphans. This bill, suggested by the Indian Office and recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the President, has been sent here for the purpose of correcting this omission in the act of the last Congress. That is all there is of it.

Mr. BEACH. The merits of the bill "have nothing to do with the case." [Laughter.] I insist on my objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the Chair will proceed to call standing and select committees for reports on private bills.

Wright, administrator, and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH B. BURTON.

Mr. SMALLS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 6705) for the relief of Joseph B. Burton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF SCHUYLKILL COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 2001) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of the county of Schuylkill, in the State of Pennsylvania, for money advanced by it under allotments made by soldiers from said county during the late rebellion by virtue of section 12 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property," approved July 22, 1861; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN RAMSEY.

Mr. LYMAN. Some time ago the bill (H. R. 6156) for the relief of John Ramsey was reported adversely by the Committee on War Claims, and was laid upon the table. The friends of the bill desire that it shall be placed upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill indicated by the gentleman from Iowa will be taken from the table and placed on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I was not in my seat when the Committee on the Judiciary was called, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from that committee.

There was no objection.

J. G. FLOURNOY.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 7303, a bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of J. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 7303 was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 37) to change the rank of an officer on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has been unexpectedly called away. I therefore request that that bill be laid over until next Friday, when he can be present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid over informally, retaining its place on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. I would state that I make this request because the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is absent.

Mr. PRICE. That does not make any difference.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the consideration of the bill now, Mr. Chairman, so it may go over under the rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the status of this bill correctly it is not in a condition where the gentleman's objection can avail. When the bill was last under consideration the committee voted on the question, and, no quorum having voted, that fact was reported to the House, and pending further consideration the House adjourned. I think the proper action now would be to resume the consideration of the bill where it was left off, and one objection can not prevent that. If it is a matter of accommodation to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I am willing that the bill shall go over, but not with the understanding that it shall occupy any other than its regular position on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. On Friday two weeks ago when the committee rose and reported the bill to the House it was upon the question, Shall the bill be laid aside and be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass?

Upon that question no quorum having voted the fact was reported to the House.

Pending that the House adjourned.

The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table?

The question being taken, the chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for a division.

Mr. SPRINGER. What was the order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question again. The question now is, Shall this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table?

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw the call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and it is so ordered.

EMMA H. FISH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1185) for the relief of Emma H. Fish; reported from the Committee on War Claims with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Emma H. Fish, widow of Arthur H. Fish, late of Company H, Third Michigan Infantry Volunteers, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from November 28, 1865, until the date when said Arthur H. Fish commenced acting as a first lieutenant, and the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry from the said ——— until June 9, 1866, deducting therefrom the pay he received as a first sergeant of infantry.

The report (by Mr. LYMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1185) for the relief of Emma H. Fish, submit the following report:

The petition and evidence in this case show that Emma H. Fish is the widow of Arthur H. Fish, who enlisted as a private in Company H, Third Michigan Infantry Volunteers, on the 26th of August, 1864, for three years or during the war, was promoted to first sergeant of said company June 15, 1865, and while serving in the latter capacity was recommended for promotion to the vacancy of second lieutenant in said company, was assigned to duty, and actually performed the duties of that grade in said company from about the 28th of November, 1865, until the final discharge of the said regiment at Detroit, Mich., on the 9th of June, 1866.

The said Arthur H. Fish was duly commissioned by his excellency the governor of Michigan, under date of January 2, 1866, as a "second lieutenant in the Third Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, to rank as such from the 28th day of November, 1865," and again, under date of June 12, 1866, as a "first lieutenant" in the said regiment, "to rank as such from the 14th day of June, 1865."

The said Arthur H. Fish was never mustered in or paid as an officer, although the positions filled by him were actually vacant when he was performing the duties of second lieutenant of said regiment. Your committee therefore agree that his widow should be paid the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 28th of November, 1865, to the 9th of June, 1866, less the sums paid to the said Arthur H. Fish as sergeant of Company H, Third Michigan Infantry Volunteers. Your committee do not find that he ever actually performed the duties of a first lieutenant.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out all of lines 8 and 9 thereof, and all of line 10 to and including the word "said."

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEELE. I object. There is nothing in the report to show that the company in which this gentleman acted as an officer was above the minimum number, and, if it was not above the minimum number, he was commissioned in violation of law and had no right at all to the commission. To pass such a bill would be setting a precedent which would allow claims to be made against the Government to the amount of many millions of dollars, and Congress has repeatedly refused to pass upon such claims. I object to this bill because it will be used as a precedent to show that we are willing to pay men who may have performed the duties of officers without being commissioned or under commissions issued in violation of law.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, this company was entitled to two commissioned officers, and at the time that Mr. Fish acted as an officer it had but two. There was a captain, who was absent on detached duty, and the company was really in charge of this officer. The company was entitled to two commissioned officers, and it had only two including Mr. Fish, and he actually performed the duties of the office, so that the passage of this bill will not set any precedent contrary to what is authorized by law.

Mr. STEELE. If there was no first lieutenant, why was not this officer commissioned as a first lieutenant, as he might lawfully have been?

Mr. LYMAN. I do not know why he was not. I only know the record shows that he was commissioned as a second lieutenant and afterward as a first lieutenant; but I think the latter was a complimentary commission, so to speak, for it was issued the day after the regiment was mustered out of service. Why he was not commissioned as a first lieutenant in the first instance I know not; but he was commissioned a second lieutenant.

Mr. STEELE. Was he not commissioned a second lieutenant because there was no vacancy in the rank of first lieutenant?

Mr. LYMAN. There was a vacancy.

Mr. STEELE. Where does the gentleman get that information?

Mr. LYMAN. From the War Department.

Mr. STEELE. At any rate he was serving under a commission not authorized by law.

Mr. LYMAN. I do not understand what foundation the gentleman has for making that assertion.

Mr. STEELE. The law provides that regiments below the minimum shall not have a colonel, and that companies below the minimum shall be deprived of a second lieutenant. That law went into effect June 20, 1863. This officer was commissioned in 1865, after the war was over.

Mr. LYMAN. If my understanding is correct no organized company was ever in such a situation that it was not entitled to two commissioned officers.

Mr. STEELE. But the law provides that those shall be a captain and first lieutenant, and that the company when below the minimum shall be deprived of a second lieutenant.

The question being taken on the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 49, noes 15.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4840) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was reached on the Calendar two weeks ago I stated that the Committee on Private Land Claims was maturing a general bill on this subject, and at that time this and several other bills of similar character were at my request laid aside informally. I desire now to state that the committee, after full consideration, has perfected that bill, and it has been reported to the House. On account of the great importance of settling these land titles we hope for the early consideration of the measure. In view of this fact I ask that this and three other bills of like character may be laid aside informally, retaining their place on the Calendar.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

FERRY ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1280) to authorize Frank W. Hunt to erect and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Frank W. Hunt, his heirs or assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to erect and maintain a ferry, either by wire, cable, or steam, across the Missouri River, at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota Territory, for a period of fifteen years.

SEC. 2. That the rates of toll across said ferry shall be fixed or established from year to year by the Secretary of War.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Before the word "years," at the end of the first section, strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten."

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. That while this charter is in existence no toll or charge shall be made for crossing the United States mail over said ferry; that the point of crossing the Missouri River to establish this ferry shall be determined upon under the authority of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. CAREY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs respectfully submit the following report:

That it appears that a ferry at the military reservation is necessary, and the committee recommend that the bill be amended as follows, and as so amended it do pass, namely: That the word "fifteen," where it occurs in the seventh line, be stricken out and the word "ten" be inserted in lieu thereof, and that the following be added as section 3 to the bill:

"That while this charter is in existence no toll or charge shall be made for crossing the United States mail over said ferry. That the point of crossing the Missouri River to establish this ferry shall be determined upon under the authority of the Secretary of War."

The bill, with proposed amendments, meets the approval of the War Department, as shown by the report of the Military Committee, No. 527, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, House bill 3263, which report is hereunto annexed:

[House Report No. 527, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs respectfully submit the following report:

That it appears that a ferry at the military reservation is necessary, and the bill is carefully drawn and meets the approval of the War Department. The committee therefore report the bill to the House with recommendation that it do pass.

The letter of the Secretary of War is made part of this report.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 23, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing for the views of this Department thereon H. R. 3263, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, a bill to authorize Frank W. Hunt to erect and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota Territory, and also H. R. 3264, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, a bill to authorize Frank W. Hunt to mine and sell coal upon the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota Territory.

In reply I beg to inform you that the matter was referred to the Lieutenant-General of the Army, who reports his approval of H. R. 3263, to authorize the establishment of a ferry across the Missouri River at Fort Buford, and his disapproval of H. R. 3264.

The views of the Lieutenant-General are concurred in by this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. CHARLES H. MORGAN,
Chairman of Subcommittee of Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding the following as an additional section:

SEC. 4. This act may be amended or repealed at any time.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not exactly see the propriety of granting an exclusive ferry privilege for ten years, as provided by this bill. The granting of such privileges is contrary to public policy, and if ever granted the grant should be accompanied with such a provision as I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I think there is no objection to his amendment.

The amendment of Mr. SPRINGER to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move to further amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the word "ten" and inserting "five," so that this ferry privilege shall be granted for five years only. I think this is a long enough term for the grant of such a privilege to any person or corporation. It is an exclusive privilege, a monopoly; and it seems to me the shorter the time for which it is granted the better it will be. The grant can be renewed at the end of five years, if necessary. I insist that an amendment of this kind is proper. This ferry is to be established, as I understand, at some military reservation in Dakota Territory. Before ten years have elapsed there may be a large city there; so that the exclusive right to run a ferry may become a franchise of great value. I respectfully submit that a term of five years for this privilege is certainly long enough.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If that should happen the amendment puts it in the power of Congress entirely to repeal the act. Then where is the necessity of limiting it to a period of five years?

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to give the right to the people, after five years' duration, to have this franchise cease, and not impose upon them the necessity of coming here to ask for its repeal. This military post may be abandoned in a few years. We are changing the location of our troops constantly. If it is abandoned this may become subject to actual settlement and cities may grow up there, railroads may desire to cross in that locality and to build a bridge, and this corporation, or this individual, or whoever may own the franchise at that place, by reason of the exclusive privilege given by Congress in this bill, may stand in the way of that public necessity being satisfied. Therefore I shall insist on my amendment, striking out "ten years," fixed as the term in the amendment of the committee, and inserting in lieu thereof "five years" as the period during which this exclusive ferry privilege shall be granted under the pending bill.

Mr. STEELE. The bill provides the right granted by the bill may be annulled at any time Congress may direct. And that, in my judgment, accomplishes everything the gentleman desires to accomplish by his amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we had better reserve, as far as possible, all these rights to the people, so that if there be a necessity to renew this grant it can be done by act of Congress, and not compel the people to come here to repeal the act when the franchise has become an obstacle in the way of settlement. I therefore insist upon my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the amendment reported by the committee reaches all that can be accomplished by the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. If this reservation is abandoned as a military post, and a large city should spring up there, then Congress has the power, under the amendment, to amend or repeal the act.

At the present time the land on both sides of the Missouri River, where Fort Buford is located, belongs to the military reservation. There is not a white settler, except those who belong to the reservation, within 16 miles of the fort. The Yellowstone River, which empties into the Missouri at Fort Buford, has some settlements, but those settlers are 16 miles from that fort. So long as Fort Buford occupies that land there would be no great number of white settlers there.

This ferry is asked for by the military stationed at Fort Buford. They desire this ferry for their accommodation. They desire this man shall run it. It is for their accommodation and for the accommodation of the Government, and I can not see any good reason why the House should refuse to grant it just as it is proposed by the committee.

Mr. STEELE. It is of so little value it is with difficulty they can get a man to agree to run the ferry.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. Yes, that is so. It can be operated for only seven or eight months in the year. The season begins about the 15th of April and ends about the 15th of October. The season, therefore, is a short one in which the ferry can be operated.

The object claimed by the gentleman from Illinois, in my judgment, is reached by the first amendment, that is to give Congress the right at any time to amend or repeal this act. I hope the last amendment, therefore, will not prevail.

Mr. SPRINGER. The cost of bringing material to run this ferry can not be very great; the expenditure will not be large; and within the period of five years the exclusive privilege of running the ferry which is granted will be long enough to indemnify this man for his outlay. All that will be necessary will be to supply himself with a movable boat and ropes to make the crossing. They can be taken there and removed at any time on slight notice.

Mr. STEELE. This is to be a steam-ferry.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then he can get away all the sooner; and if necessary he can run upstream and locate the ferry somewhere else. Five years is a term long enough to give for this exclusive privilege. Ten years from now, it may be, the whole military reservation may be abandoned and a city built where it is now. This franchise may then become one of great value. We all know when a franchise is once given to a corporation how difficult it is for the people to secure its revocation. While we have the power in our hands let us limit this exclusive privilege to the shortest possible period necessary. If at the end of five years we find it proper to continue the privilege, it will be easy for Congress to do so. And if at the end of five years the people desire that it shall cease, that can be done without trouble by the expiration of the limitation in the act itself. I insist on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 56.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made of no quorum, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. WOODBURN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 81.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will not insist further on the point of order, as it seems to me the disposition of the House is to grant a longer period than five years.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The committee's amendment was then agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS F. PURNELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2397) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas F. Purnell, of Austin, Tex., the sum of $1,000, in full reimbursement of that amount paid by said Purnell on the 15th of April, 1875, as United States marshal for the western district of Texas, for the arrest of Peter McCartney, by order of J. L. Duckworth and L. B. Whitney, special agents of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LANHAM. This bill provides for the reimbursement to the marshal for the western district of Texas of the sum paid by him as a reward for the capture of a party indicted for the passing of counterfeit money. The bill was reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee at the last Congress, and has been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims at this. If there be no opposition I move it be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER SMILEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 221) for the relief of Alexander Smiley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and required to remit the amount of $660.94 assessed against Alexander Smiley, proprietor of distillery No. 2, in the county of Mississippi and State of Missouri: Provided, That he shall be satisfied that said Smiley has fully paid to the Government all taxes due for spirits actually made by his distillery from the 1st day of February to the 23d day of April, 1875.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this case was reported favorably by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House in the Forty-sixth Congress for $874.34. In the Forty-seventh Congress it was favorably reported by the Senate Committee and passed the Senate, but failed to be reached for action in the House. In the Forty-eighth Congress again it passed the Senate, but failed of passage in the House for the amount recommended by the Committee on Claims—that is to say, $660.94.

This, I will state, is in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I move, therefore, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. FANNY S. CONWAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 914) for the relief of Mrs. Fanny S. Conway.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to Mrs. Fanny S. Conway, widow of Dr. Ed. Conway, lost in the Grampus in 1843, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $700, being the amount due and unpaid her under act of Congress.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

In line 7, strike out "seven hundred" and insert "two hundred and seventy."

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill is now reported by the Committee on Claims, and was favorably reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-sixth and also in the Forty-seventh Congress. It was introduced by the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], to whom I yield so much time as he may desire.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, unless there be some one who wishes a further explanation of the bill, I will move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN FRASER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1982) for the relief of John Fraser.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $914.20 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment in full to John Fraser for services as acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury during 1878 and 1879.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill, Mr. Chairman, is favorably reported at this session of Congress from the Committee on Claims unanimously; it was also favorably reported from the Committee on Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress, and also by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the same Congress. Unless some question be raised I move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommedation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report in this case had better be read.

The report (by Mr. BUCHANAN) was read, as follows:

This bill was favorably reported from the Committee on Claims of the Forty-seventh Congress (first session, Report No. 1723), and also from the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds (Forty-seventh Congress, first session, Report 191). For the reasons set forth in said report, which your committee adopt as their own, they recommend the passage of the bill.

The following is the report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5680) for the relief of John Fraser, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate (Forty-seventh Congress, first session, Report 191), made the following report in this case:

That on December 5, 1878, Mr. James G. Hill, Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, was suspended from office by the following Department letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 5, 1878.

SIR: In view of the indictment pending against you in the circuit court of the United States, in Chicago, of which you have given me verbal notice, I am directed by the President to suspend you from this date from the execution of your official duties until after the trial.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

JAMES G. HILL, Esq.,
Supervising Architect.

On the same day Mr. John Fraser, who was at that time employed as superintendent of the construction of Bureau of Engraving and Printing building, was directed to assume the duties of the office during the suspension of Mr. Hill by the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 5, 1878.

SIR: You are hereby directed to take charge of the office, and perform the duties, of Supervising Architect during the suspension of Mr. J. G. Hill from duty.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Mr. JOHN FRASER,
Superintendent of Construction of the new Building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

On May 22, 1879, Mr. Hill was directed to resume the duties of Supervising Architect by the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1879.

SIR: Having been acquitted on the indictment found against you in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, you will resume your duties as Supervising Architect of this Department, from which office you were suspended December 5 last.

I am, very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Mr. JAMES G. HILL.

Mr. Hill received his pay in full from December 1, 1878, to May 31, 1879, namely, $2,258.20, which period covered the time of his suspension.

Mr. Fraser was paid as superintendent of construction, while acting as Supervising Architect, from December 6, 1878, to May 22, 1879, a period of five months and sixteen days, $1,344, being at the rate of $8 per diem.

Your committee are of opinion that Mr. Fraser is entitled to additional compensation to the amount of the difference between the appropriated salary of Supervising Architect and the pay he received as superintendent of construction of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing building, from December 1, 1878, to May 5, 1879, and report a substitute for the bill, and recommend the passage of the substitute as reported.

This committee adopt said report as their own, and therefore report back the accompanying bill, and recommend that the same do pass, with an amendment for the payment to said Fraser of the sum of $914.20.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to say what has been the more recent practice in regard to this class of claims, but in former years it was held that where an officer in one of the Departments was assigned to the performance of a temporary duty, of the chief of a bureau or the head of a Department, such an assignment was not to be followed by an increase of his salary from the lower to the higher position whose duties he was performing. It is a matter of frequent occurrence in the administration of the affairs of a Department or a bureau that some subordinate officer is frequently called upon to fill the duties of the higher position. I can remember one particular instance of a gentleman who for many years had a bill pending—a gentleman who was subsequently Secretary of the Senate—who had a bill introduced into the Senate, which was passed a number of times, paying him for services rendered as Secretary of State, he being at the time assistant Secretary. It was considered by both Houses for several years; but finally it was held that it was not the policy of the Government, where an officer was simply assigned to a temporary duty, to pay him the increased salary. If the practice in this regard in more recent years has been otherwise I am not aware of it; but if it has been reversed it does not seem to be a proper policy as a general thing.

In this particular instance, which we are now called to consider, the two positions named here are about of the same importance to the Government, and involve practically the same degree of capacity and intelligence to perform the duties well. This will be found frequently the case where these assignments are made, and it hardly seems good policy, where there may be such temporary assignment, that there should be a payment to the chief of the bureau or Department of the whole salary, and at the same time some subordinate officer should be paid the same amount for temporarily performing the duties. I have no doubt, however, that the gentleman from New Jersey has considered the subject carefully, and what has been the policy in more recent years, as to whether such claims are properly to be paid.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The committee so understood it; and, Mr. Chairman, as I remarked, this bill was favorably reported from the Committee on Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress and from the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the same Congress. It comes here now unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims of the present Congress, and it presents simply a question of paying this gentleman for the services which he rendered at the rate at which the law rates these services. That is all there is in it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to ask my friend from New Jersey a question. The present assistant Secretary of the Treasury has to perform the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. Is it proposed to pay him the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury? I believe the Attorney-General has been sick for some time, and his colaborers have performed the duties of that office. Is it proposed to pay them the salary of the Attorney-General?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is a very different case. They are simply temporary assignments, temporary in character and time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Was this anything but a temporary assignment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman will hold his impatience until I get through he will understand the question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will, with much pleasure.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This gentleman discharged these duties from the 1st of December, 1878, continuing until the 5th day of May, 1879, a period of over five months. The assignment was temporary in the first place; it was understood when it was made that it would be temporary. But the trial of the principal at Chicago was delayed beyond all human expectation; and this man continued at this post for the five months and rendered the service. The Government has had the benefit of his services, and in all honesty ought to pay for them.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Now, the gentleman from New Jersey having made his statement, I ask him what there is in this case which prevents the employment from being considered temporary? I see nothing which distinguishes it from a temporary assignment or employment. It was for five months, but only for five months.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The assignment was temporary in character but not temporary as to time. It continued for such a length of time that the cases the gentleman from Tennessee speaks of are not precedents. This is not a case where a man takes a position for a few days and simply performs after a perfunctory manner or in a mechanical way the duties which have already been outlined for him. But this was a responsible position; the principal was suspended while awaiting his trial, and this man was compelled to have entire charge of that division and retain the charge of it for nearly half a year.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from New Jersey says this assignment was temporary in character, but not temporary in time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I made use of that expression to express in a few words my meaning. I hope that has not become a crime upon this floor. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S motion, the chairman stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 21.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask for tellers, a quorum not having voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. BUCHANAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 40.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

H. H. FAULKNER AND MARY WOODLEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2357) for the relief of H. H. Faulkner and Mary Woodlee; reported by the Committee on Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States pay to H. H. Faulkner, of McMinnville, Tenn., the sum of $120.60, the amount paid by him for three internal-revenue stamps in January, 1882, with interest thereon, said stamps having been purchased to be placed upon 3 barrels of apple brandy purchased by the said H. H. Faulkner from Mary Woodlee, and said brandy being seized by a revenue officer before said stamps were attached to the packages.

SEC. 2. That they likewise pay to Mary Woodlee, of Grundy County, Tennessee, the sum of $81.38, the net proceeds of the 3 barrels of brandy she had sold to H. H. Faulkner, but which were seized, condemned, and sold unlawfully by a United States revenue officer, and before delivered to said Faulkner.

Mr. NEAL. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. NEAL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2357) for the relief of H. H. Faulkner and Mary Woodlee, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

The files of the House of Representatives show that this claim was investigated and reported favorably by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress. The report mentioned embodies a statement of the facts as disclosed by the proof on file, and is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4914) for the relief of H. H. Faulkner and Mary Woodlee, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

"That during the year 1882 the said H. H. Faulkner was engaged as a wholesale liquor dealer in McMinnville, Tenn.; that as such he purchased of the said Mary Woodlee, who was a resident of Grundy County, Tennessee, 3 barrels of apple brandy, which she had had distilled from fruit belonging to her and her children at the licensed distillery of Woodlee & Cathcart, in Grundy County, Tennessee, for which he was to pay her the price agreed upon; that said Faulkner sent to Nashville and purchased of W. M. Woodcock, collector of internal revenue, three stamps to be placed upon said brandy, for which he paid $120.60; that upon the receipt of said stamps said Faulkner sent his team with said stamps to be placed upon said brandy, and to bring the same to his warehouse in McMinnville. Upon his team reaching the distillery it was found that one James M. Davis, a deputy collector, had on that day seized the distillery of said Woodlee & Cathcart, together with 10 barrels of brandy belonging to them, and also the 3 barrels purchased by Faulkner from Mrs. Woodlee, and took the same away. The said Faulkner immediately forwarded his stamps purchased as aforesaid to his Representative in Congress, to see if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would not refund his money.

"Mary Woodlee was a poor, uneducated widow, living 18 miles in the country; did not know what to do. In the mean time the thirty days allowed by law for her or Faulkner to lay claim to said 3 barrels brandy expired, and said brandy was sold by the collector at $1.65 per gallon, and the proceeds held in the United States district court until the termination of the suit against the distillers, Woodlee & Cathcart. Woodlee & Cathcart, or Greer Woodlee, one of said firm, contested said seizure and sale in the United States district court at Chattanooga, when, upon a trial, the court decided that the 10 barrels of brandy and all other property seized by said deputy collector was wrongfully seized, and decreed that the property should be restored to said distillers, and that as said brandy, when all sold, had brought $352.26, after paying taxes on the same, the court also decreed that said distillers should be paid ten-thirteenths of said sum, amounting to $271.27, leaving for Mrs. Woodlee's 3 barrels $81.38, which the court declared forfeited, while Faulkner and she were trying to get their money refunded during the pendency of said suit, and directed that all of the costs of the suit and seizure should be paid out of the proceeds of said 3 barrels, and the balance paid into the Treasury, which was done.

"The affidavit of J. E. Jones, United States gauger, is on file that he gauged and marked said 3 barrels of brandy for Faulkner and Mrs. Woodlee, and marked them as required by law, and as there was no effort to deceive or defraud any one, and as the court decided the seizure was illegal and void, and as neither the said H. H. Faulkner nor Mary Woodlee were in any manner to blame or responsible for said seizure, and the proof shows that the brandy was made for Mrs. Woodlee out of apples furnished by her, and all the taxes paid out of the proceeds, your committee are of opinion that she should be paid the proceeds of her 3 barrels of brandy, after paying the tax, to wit, $81.38, and that H. H. Faulkner should be paid for said stamps, which are filed with the papers in this case, $120.60, and they therefore recommend the passage of said bill."

Your committee adopt said report as its own, concur in the conclusions therein expressed, and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

M'MINNVILLE AND MANCHESTER RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5194) directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, and for other purposes; reported by the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to settle and adjust the claims of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company against the United States for iron, chairs, spikes, and switches, upon the basis of estimates furnished by A. Hibard, engineer of repairs, under orders of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, commanding department, dated July 18, 1865, taken and used by the United States Army, the items thereof being: for railroad iron, $231,880; for chairs, $7,200; for spikes, $6,300, and for switches, $1,500, making a total of $246,880, which sum shall be allowed said company in making such settlement.

SEC. 2. That from the value of the property thus taken and used, which is hereby declared to be said sum of $246,880, the Quartermaster-General will deduct the amount now due and owing to the UnitedStates by the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, which is evidenced by a judgment in the United States circuit court at Nashville, Tenn.

SEC. 3. That any balance thus found to be due said McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company shall be paid to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, or their succesosrs, the Nashville, Chattanooga and Saint Louis Railway, in the bonds of indebtedness of the latter company held by the United States for material purchased of the United States since the close of the war, and said judgment shall thereupon be satisfied of record.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation; but I am ready to make any explanation, if it is desired.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. There will be opposition to that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be as well to have the report read?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to the report being read. It is short.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2340, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

The whole matter was brought before the House in the Forty-eighth Congress. The bill H. R. 2727 was referred to the Judiciary Committee and was carefully considered. That committee, on February 18, 1885, submitted a favorable report upon same to the House, said report being No. 2612.

The committee, having carefully considered the bill and all the records in the case furnished by the Secretary of War, have arrived at the same conclusion reached by the Judiciary Committee as stated in said report. The committee, however, have directed that a new bill be presented which more clearly embodies the principles upon which they think the settlement should be made with said railroad company. This bill is herewith presented as a substitute for bill H. R. 2340, and the committee recommend its passage. The debt due to the United States from the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company is now in judgment in the circuit court of the United States at Nashville, Tenn.

For further report the committee beg leave to copy literally and submit as their own the report made as aforesaid by the Judiciary Committee of the House in the Forth-eighth Congress, in the words and figures following:

"This claim is not what is usually called a Southern war claim, but arises out of the following facts:

"During the war the iron upon 25½ miles of the railroad belonging to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, in Tennessee, was taken up under an order issued by General George H. Thomas, and was used in repairing the tracks of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. This seizure and appropriation of the iron were not acts of war or the destruction of rebel property, but the seizure was made and the iron appropriated by the Government under the act of Congress approved 31st January, 1862.

"After the war closed the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company made a claim against the Government for the value of the iron removed and for the value of the properties destroyed in consequence of the removal of the iron. This application was referred by the Quartermaster-General to Major Stephens, general superintendent military railroads, and by him was referred to A. Hibard, engineer of repairs, to report at once the value of the iron and other property taken under the order. This officer made an estimate of the value of the property and returned it to the Quartermaster-General, who declined to pay the amount solely upon the ground that under the act of the 31st January, 1862, the value of the property should be assessed by a board of officers appointed by the President. No such board was ever appointed by the President, and other claims of similar character were adjusted and settled by the Quartermaster-General. This will appear from letters addressed to Hon. G. G. Dibrell, of Tennessee, which are appended to this report and asked to be made a part of it.

"It appears to your committee that the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company has purchased the McMinnville and Manchester road, and that the said company is largely indebted to the Government of the United States for railroad properties, including the iron taken from the McMinnville and Manchester road, purchased after the war. It also appears that the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company is indebted to the United States for similar property purchased by it after the war. The bill provides that the Quartermaster-General shall ascertain the value of the iron taken and used by the Government as above stated, and shall deduct therefrom the amount due the Government from said company, and shall pay the remainder to the company in the bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Company, which the Government holds for the payment of the indebtedness due from said company.

"There can be no objection to this mode of settlement, as the Government owns these bonds and the McMinnville and Manchester Company is willing to receive them. The letter referred to is as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., January 21, 1885.

"SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a communication from Hon. G. G. Dibrell, M. C., of this date, inclosing a copy of H. R. 2727, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, and asking to be informed whether any settlements have been made with railroad companies of the South for property taken from said railroads or for use, such as the claim of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, in Tennessee.

"The records of this office do not show the settlement of any such claim by payment in money.

"It is observed, however, that in compromising the indebtedness of certain Southern railroad companies for material purchased of the United States at the close of the war, those which had presented claims of this character (for example, the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia, and the Memphis and Little Rock) agreed, in consideration of such compromise, under which the amounts of their indebtedness were reduced, to waive and release the United States from all obligations to pay for property taken by the United States from said railroads or for their use.

"I recommend that Mr. Dibrell be advised accordingly.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"S. B. HOLABIRD,
"Quartermaster-General United States Army.

"The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 26, 1885.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 21st instant (to the Quartermaster-General) inclosing a copy of H. R. 2727, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, "directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes," and requesting information as to whether any settlements have been made with railroad companies of the South for property taken, or for use, such as the claim of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad in Tennessee, I have the honor to inclose herewith a report upon the subject by the Quartermaster-General, dated the 21st instant, which it is believed furnishes the information desired.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. G. G. DIBRELL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This case was fully considered in the Forty-eighth Congress by the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill was referred to that committee and considered by it under the order of the House; and a unanimous report was made by that committee in favor of the passage of the bill. At this session of Congress the bill was again introduced and I asked to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary again, but under the rules of the House it was referred to the Committee on War Claims. That committee, by a subcommittee composed of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], and myself, made a careful examination of the facts involved in the question, and again by a committee of the House the bill was reported favorably. I know, sir, from my familiarity with the facts of the case that it is eminently right and proper the bill should pass. I do not care to occupy the time of the committee in discussing it further unless some gentleman opposes the bill. I therefore reserve my time.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It is true, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] states, this bill has been reported by the Committee on War Claims. It is also true that certain members of that committee reserved the right to oppose the bill, if, upon looking into the record in the case, they thought that it was right for them to do so.

This claim grows out of the railroad transactions in the South during the war. It is a claim upon the part of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company to collect for certain iron taken off their road and laid upon the Memphis and Chattanooga Railroad. I will be pleased if the gentleman from Tennessee will let me have the record in this case. I ask him to send me over the papers.

It appears this road is one of the captured roads of the South. It was captured during the war. I believe at the time of its capture it was taken as enemy's property; and, if I am not mistaken, the record shows that by order of General Rosecrans, then in command, the bridges and the water-tanks and the buildings upon the line of the road were destroyed as a matter of military necessity.

Subsequently, the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad fell into the hands of the Government, and was being operated by the Government. The road needed repairs, and while the Government was holding the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad as captured property they took up some iron from it with which to repair the Nashville and Chattanooga road. They used the railroads until the close of the war.

When the war closed the organizations were allowed to resume control of their roads. This company made application to have its road restored, and an order to that effect was made. The report states that General Thomas ordered that the road should be estimated with a view of having it turned over. He ordered an estimate made, and I have no doubt that the estimate was made by a competent man; but it was an estimate not of the amount of property taken from the company, but, as gentlemen will see by the order, an estimate of the amount it would cost to put the road in as good condition as it was in before. It was made with no view of binding the General Government, but merely as a matter of precaution, to find out how much it would take to put the road in that condition. When these people applied to the General Government to have the road turned over, the record shows that the Quartermaster's Department refused to turn it over because the road was held as captured property, and not because the viewers were not appointed by the President.

It is true they said they could not turn it over under the order, but both in the report of the quartermaster and in the order of General Thomas himself it is stated that the road was held as captured property, and the recommendation was made that the Government should not turn it over, because it was not held by virtue of the law. Now, then, when the Government refused to turn that road back these parties applied to the Government to sell a certain amount of rolling stock. Under the law and under executive orders the Government did sell them $20,000 worth of rolling stock, but after they got it they were like a man who has a buggy without a horse, or a horse without a buggy—they had no railroad track upon which to run their rolling stock; so they applied to the Government to sell them iron with which to lay a track, and the Government sold them $26,000 worth of iron for that purpose.

The Government took an obligation from the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad to pay that money within two years, with interest, and also an obligation that the road should carry the mails and should do whatever transportation of Government troops might be required without demanding pay; the amount of such service to be credited on this debt. It appears that prior to that time, away back when the road was built, the State of Tennessee had loaned its credit to the company to the amount of $750,000.

After the company had repaired the road and put the iron upon it and the rolling stock which the Government had furnished, the State sought to foreclose its lien, and a controversy grew up. The road was sold, under a decree, to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. They held it a while, and during the time they were holding it they utterly refused to carry out the contract made by the other company with the General Government. They refused to carry the mails upon the original contract, holding that they had purchased the road and were not bound by the contract made with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and the Government was compelled to employ private parties to carry the mail upon the dirt road. The Government then brought suit to foreclose its lien of $46,000, which at that time, with interest, amounted to $98,000. The record shows—I have been unable to find the judgment rendered in that case—but the record shows that the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company set up a claim for iron and spikes taken against the bonded contract. In other words, they sought to avoid the payment of $98,000 because the Government owed the corporation for property taken.

Now, whether or not that offset was adjudicated I can not tell, but the record shows that they set up that claim. We are to presume that it was adjudicated and found against the railroad company, from the simple fact that the judgment was rendered for the entire amount. If adjudicated in that transaction it should be res adjudicata, and if not adjudicated they could have adjudicated it. Judgment was rendered in favor of the United States. That judgment, amounting, principal and interest, to over $100,000, stands to-day unsatisfied.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman will allow me to say it is admitted there is a claim due to the Government; and the effort here is not to avoid the payment of that claim, but to secure the allowance of a set-off for property which the Government obtained from this railroad company.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that the railroad company now says to the Government, "If you will pay us $264,000, which you claim you do not owe, we will pay you the $100,000 which we admit we do owe." I understand the proposition clearly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the gentleman on closer examination will find that his statement is not sustained by the record.

Mr. HOUK rose.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I would prefer that gentlemen should postpone their questions till after I get through. I have had two or three very good speeches spoiled by yielding for questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. Did not General Thomas admit that the railroad company was to be paid for the iron and other property taken and used by the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. All through this record it is claimed both by the War Department and by the Quartermaster-General that the Government held this road as captured property.

Mr. HOUK rose.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. You gentlemen will have the chance to argue this question after I am through.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will yield for one gentleman at a time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The fact appears in the record that General Thomas ordered an investigation into the value of this property seized by the Government, and that investigation was made; and further that he called upon his engineers in order to ascertain what it would cost to put the road in the same condition in which the Government found it, the rails having been taken up and carried off. That is the state of the case.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I admitted in my opening remarks that General Thomas did authorize the quartermaster to ascertain the value of this road; but I deny that the record discloses that General Thomas ever admitted that the Government owed this road a single dollar.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then for what purpose was the ascertainment of the value of the road made?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I presume the object was the same in this as in numerous other cases where similar assessments were made. In many cases where a military board was ordered to assess private property there was never any intention of paying for it, the only object being to have the finding as a matter of evidence if the question should ever come up.

Now in order to satisfy my friends on the other side of this question let me read what General Thomas said:

The attention of the honorable Secretary of War is respectfully invited to the report as giving a complete statement of the indebtedness of the Southern railroads to the United States Government at this time and of the efforts of some of these corporations to evade and defer payment, as under recent instructions from the War Department the charge of the collection of those amounts is to be transferred to the Quartermaster-General at Washington, relieving me from responsibility.

Mr. RICHARDSON. From what does the gentleman read?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. From a copy of the letter of General Thomas when he turned over this road from his control to that of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the date?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. November 23, 1867.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was turned over in 1865.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Eighteen hundred and sixty-seven is the date. He says—

I can only recommend that the Government hold these roads to their contract; that they be compelled to liquidate their indebtedness upon the terms now agreed upon without consideration or recognition in the least degree for any claim for damages or use by occupation of the United States, such claims being believed to be without foundation in justice and in right.

A persistent, combined effort on the part of these companies to compel the recognition of their claims has been as persistently ignored and repudiated by me, until the efforts, for want of success, have gradually been remitted."

This statement is signed by "George H. Thomas, major-general commanding;" and it shows that he always refused to recognize these claims. Yet gentlemen maintain that because he sent a man to make an estimate the Government is thereby committed to payment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that what he has read relates to claims for use and occupation. There is no claim here for use and occupation of the railroad.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. This was a claim to have the road restored to the company that had once owned it. But if the Government held the road as captured property, what foundation could there be for any return of that property? You abandon any claim to recover for the tanks burned by General Rosecrans; you abandon any claim for the bridges burned by him; you abandon any claim for personal property destroyed by him; all this is abandoned in this report; yet because a few pounds of iron were taken up, it is claimed there is a right of recovery. If the Government is responsible for one it is responsible for all.

This Chattanooga railroad at the same time bought a certain amount of rolling stock and iron for which payment was made in the bonds of the company, bearing interest at the rate of 7.3 per cent. That debt remains unpaid to-day. They have since bought this McMinnville and Manchester road, not from the corporation itself, but from a third party. And now, when this record shows that they have no rights in the matter except so far as they assume to be the purchasers of the McMinnville and Manchester road, they come in and ask that this $264,000 shall be treated as a set-off upon the debt which they owe the General Government.

Now, there is another fact which this record discloses. I want to call attention to the reasen why the Government held this road as captured property. The record discloses the fact that these railroad corporations were the most active rebels in all that country; that these corporations furnished the means of transporting the troops of the national enemies.

Mr. Chairman, how much of my time have I taken up?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-three minutes of his hour.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I was making the point that this railroad corporation was one of the most efficient agents of the confederacy. This report shows it. All of these papers show that fact. Not only that they transported troops for the confederacy, but they used all their corporate power to assist the confederacy. Not only that, but they bankrupted the corporation itself by investing its surplus funds in confederate bonds. This report shows that fact. Consequently, when the General Government took control of the road, what did it get? It merely got the houses and bridges on it. It got the old iron and the other material which they could not take away. But every dollar of rolling-stock had followed the fortunes of the confederacy. As an agent of the confederacy the General Government took possession of the road as captured property, as property taken from an enemy.

Now, sir, I do not object to the passage of this bill so much because of the amount of money involved in it. I hold the General Government should be honest, and be as ready to pay $250,000 of just debt as $250. I hope, therefore, when gentlemen on the other side come to present their side of this question they will show why this railroad corporation, following the fortunes of the confederacy, shall be paid for its lost property, while the loyal citizen alongside of that road shall be refused payment for his property taken upon the ground of military necessity?

You open up this doctrine that you are to pay these corporations, but you are not to pay these private individuals. You thereby do injustice to the private individual. If they can show me any reason why a corporation, with its aggregate thousands, has any better right to remuneration than an individual whose all is wrapped up in the question, then I will concede the case; but there is nothing in this whole transaction, from beginning to end, that shows anything of the kind.

If we are to tear loose from every principle established by the Government, if we are to abandon every principle laid down by the Department, and go to paying for this captured property, then, sir, we have entered upon a field where we will have a great deal of lively litigation. [Laughter.]

If we are to establish that principle, then I want this House to say why it will refuse to pay the loyal man who joined his fortunes with the Union Army simply because it was an act of war. If you can make the distinction I want to see it made.

Then we will have a precedent, Mr. Chairman, of a very dangerous character established. This is making a new precedent, and a very dangerous one, without seeing where it is to drive us. Not long ago we passed a bill appropriating some $30,000 or $40,000 to some ladies living in Louisiana, merely because General Butler had written a foolish letter telling them their property should be protected from destruction. It was conceded it was an isolated case, but now they come here and ask you to pay $264,000 simply because General Thomas ordered an estimate to be made. Pass this, then, as a precedent, and you must pay for every railroad corporation in the South.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if we are to be liberal to anybody, we had better be liberal to the men who stood by the flag of the country, rather than to the men who admit they did all they could to aid the rebellion.

That there may have been one or two loyal men in that corporation I will concede for the sake of argument; but its sympathies were with the South in the rebellion. And it is now simply a scheme to legislate not in the interests of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, but in the interest of the Memphis and Chattanooga Railroad, which bought it, and which is not only seeking to avoid paying the $90,000 to the McMinnville and Manchester road, but to get credit for $174,000 of debt they owed and which the record does not show they paid.

I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to occupy any great length of time in the discussion of the matter now before the committee. I take a part in this discussion mainly because as a member of that committee I concurred in the report which has been made; and, as has been announced by the gentleman from Tennessee, I was a member of the subcommittee that made examination of this case prior to its being reported to and acted upon by the whole committee.

I can see nothing in this case, Mr. Chairman, that calls for anything except a consideration of the mere business features now presented for our action. There is nothing else in it; and, in order that the matter may be fully understood as to what this matter really is, we must, in the first place, understand exactly what question is presented and the case which we are trying.

Now, it has been said, Mr. Chairman, and repeated, that this railroad property was taken as abandoned property under the abandoned property act. It has been said further that this was the property of rebels. Our Supreme Court has already settled that none of these acts—granting for the moment that this railroad was taken possession of by the Federal Government in pursuance of the abandoned property act, granting also for the moment that there was this attempt on the part of General Thomas or General Rosecrans or whoever might have been then in command in Tennessee—yet the Supreme Court has said in the case of the Planters' Bank against the Union Bank that these acts do not apply to corporations; that is, the captured and abandoned property act, those measures of legislation providing for the seizure of property of absent enemies; that they did not apply to any persons but natural persons; in other words, they did not apply to artificial persons, to corporations; and it will not do, Mr. Chairman, to say that that railroad company was a rebel. The fact is, as I am informed by gentlemen whose information I believe to be correct and in whom I have full confidence, that the officers of this corporation were Union men.

I am told that President Harrison, the president of the company, who was during the war its president and in which position he continued until his death, a few days ago, was always a Union man. At the time of his death I am told that he was the chairman of the Republican committee in the State of Tennessee. He has been an elector, as I am informed, upon the Republican ticket in Tennessee, once at least, if not more than once, and I am reminded by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] upon my left that he has been a member of this House, elected by the Republicans of the State of Tennessee. So that if we were called upon to consider this question at all in the disposition of this matter, I think we may say that this railroad was a Union band.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And let me also add to what the gentleman has said that he was not only all that, but he was chancellor and supreme judge of Tennessee.

Mr. LYMAN. All of which evidence is cumulative to show that the railroad was upon the side of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa if the record shows that fact?

Mr. LYMAN. I do not know whether it shows it or not——

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LYMAN. I leave that question to be answered by gentlemen more familiar than myself, but I am told the record does show it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this, as I have said, is a mere matter of business, in which this Government is interested, in which there is a question of settlement of accounts between the Government and the McMinnville Railroad Company. I have said this property was not taken under the abandoned-property act. It was not taken as the property of an absent enemy. It was taken under the act of Congress passed on the 31st day of January, 1862, and I will ask the Clerk to read the first and third sections of this act.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety may require it, be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of any or all the telegraph lines in the United States, their offices and appurtenances; to take possession of any or all the railroad lines in the United States, their rolling stock, their offices, shops, buildings, and all their appendages and appurtenances; to prescribe rules and regulations for the holding, using, and maintaining of the aforesaid telegraph and railroad lines and to extend, repair, and complete the same in the manner most conducive to the safety and interest of the Government; to place under military control all the officers, agents, and employés belonging to the telegraph and railroad lines thus taken possession of by the President so that they shall be considered as a post-road and part of the military establishment of the United States, subject to all the restrictions imposed by the Rules and Articles of War.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That three commissioners shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to assess and determine the damages suffered, or the compensation to which any railroad or telegraph company may be entitled by reason of the railroad or telegraph line being seized and used under the authority conferred by this act, and their award shall be submitted to Congress for their action.

Mr. LYMAN. That, Mr. Chairman, is important, inasmuch as the Government took possession of this McMinnville Railroad.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What form of taking possession did the Government use pursuant to this statute, which has been read, of this road, and what was the condition of the road when you say they took possession of it?

Mr. LYMAN. It was being operated by the owners—by the company.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You are wonderfully mistaken in that.

Mr. LYMAN. Am I? I am very sorry, if that be true.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There was nothing but the road and bed, the right of way—a streak of dust and the right of way.

Mr. HOUK. I think I will show the gentleman after a while that there was a great deal more than that.

Mr. LYMAN. I do not know that it is very material to this discussion just what condition that road was in. It was there; it was not the property of the Government; it was taken by the Government, and taken under the act a portion of which has just been read from the Clerk's desk. Now, then, the Government took up the iron from this road and placed it upon what is called the Chattanooga road. It took up the tracks, leaving, as I am informed, the ties, which I understand were left there and rotted and wasted away. This McMinnville road is a branch of the Chattanooga Railroad.

The depots of this road were destroyed, were burned at different times during the Federal occupation of that country. The iron, as I have said, was taken up and actually laid down upon the Chattanooga road.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I only desire light upon this subject in order to do what is right between these companies and the Government. But as I read the report I find this iron was taken up from the McMinnville road and laid down upon the Chattanooga road. I also find by the bill that the Chattanooga road is the only beneficiary in the bill Why should they be paid for that which they received?

Mr. LYMAN. I will try to explain that before I get through. I have been endeavoring to give a history of the transaction as briefly as I may, and I think before I get through the question of the gentleman from New Jersey will be fully answered; at least it will be as far as I am able to do it.

This left this McMinnville road entirely destroyed, so to speak. Its iron and the spikes had been put on the Chattanooga road. Its depots and water-tanks had been destroyed, and the old ties were lying there on the track.

This bill provides for the adjustment of nothing but the iron and spikes, the property that was actually taken from the McMinnville grade and placed on the Chattanooga roadway. It may be said the burning of these water-tanks and depots was of the class of the ordinary depredations of war. This committee has never proposed to pay or adjust any such claim as that. It has been the constant policy of that committee, so long as I have been connected with it, that it would not recommend payment for the ordinary unlawful and unauthorized ravages of war. But the claim made here is not that. The bill asks for the adjustment of claims that actually exist for property that was actually taken. The committee have rejected all claims for use of property, for depots and water-tanks burned, and all claims for ties that lay there on the old roadway and rotted. It presents nothing but the property actually taken and laid down on the Chattanooga track.

After the war was over, after hostilities had ceased, and the Government had no further use for this property, there was a sale of this road and of the property attached to it, as there was of all the military roads of the South. The Chattanooga company bought a large amount of property, rolling stock, and other railroad property, and in payment to the Government therefor gave its bonds, which the Government holds today; and among the property that the Chattanooga company bought was this very iron.

Mr. GEDDES. Will my colleague on the committee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEDDES. As a matter of information, that no erroneous impression may be made, I desire to ask the gentleman whether from the examination of the record precisely the contrary does not appear; that is to say, that all the property of this McMinnville road that could be identified by any one was turned over by the Government to the McMinnville company, and that there was no attempt to sell any property?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not so appear in the record.

Mr. GEDDES. I will show it.

Mr. LYMAN. I do not understand that is the record. What I state here is what I believe to be the record as I understand it. I may be mistaken, however, in my understanding of it.

I was saying that the Chattanooga road in the purchase made from the Government purchased the very iron and spikes for which this settlement is now asked. It gave to the Government its bonds, which the Government now holds for this identical iron and spikes.

The McMinnville road also undertook a resuscitation after the war was over. That company purchased property from the Government as the result of the sale by the Government of these military roads. It purchased property and it gave its bond; I believe it gave its bond; at least it became indebted to the Government for the property it bought. Afterward, as it has been stated, an action was brought in the United States circuit court of the district of Tennessee against the McMinnville Railroad Company upon its indebtedness to the United States. That suit has gone to judgment. The amount of the judgment I do not know; I do not deem it material for the purposes of this discussion. But there is a judgment, as I understand it, in favor of the United States for the amount of the original indebtedness against the McMinnville road.

Now, then, this is what this bill proposes to do. As has been said, the Chattanooga road is now understood to be the owner of the McMinnville road. The McMinnville road asks now that it shall be allowed for the value of the property, the iron and the spikes that were actually taken off from that road and placed on the Chattanooga road and afterward sold by the Government, for which the Government holds the bonds of the Chattanooga road. It asks that that value shall be allowed.

The claim has been before the Quartermaster's Department. The Quartermaster's Department refused to settle this. Why? Because there had been no commission appointed, as provided by the third section of the law which I have had read in the hearing of the committee. Because of the mere technicality that the value of the property had not been arrived at through a commission appointed, as provided in the act this settlement could not be had, and it had to come to this body for adjustment. The McMinnville road then proposes there shall be an accounting between itself and the Government, and that whatever balance is found due it upon this accounting it will accept payment of in the bonds of the Chattanooga road which the Government now holds.

Mr. GEDDES. Does not the gentleman know, as he has reported (because he is in part responsible for this report) that there is no adjusting until called for—that the committee adjust the claim, and find that there is due $246,880, and recommend that amount to be paid.

Mr. LYMAN. Well, perhaps I ought to have used some other word, but that is what the bill proposes. The value that the committee found as the value of the iron, spikes, &c., is the exact value that the officers of the Quartermaster's Department, sent there by authority of the Government, fixed upon that property. The judgment at Nashville in the United States circuit court will speak for itself as to what it is. Perhaps I ought not to have said "adjusted," for the committee does take the value that the Government officers found as the value of the railroad iron, and does recommend that payment be made upon that basis. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to see anything wrong in this.

I think my record upon this floor, so far as it has been made, shows that I am not one of those who are in favor of the reckless payment of claims against the Government brought up here from the Southern States. I think my position upon that question is pretty well understood. But when we have here a mere question of a business settlement, it does seem to me that the Government ought to be ready to do what is right and fair, as its citizens are expected to do in dealings between man and man. I have already said that there is no claim made for ravages, for the destruction of water-tanks, depots, or other property; there is not an allowance of one dollar for anything except what actually went into the Chattanooga road, having previously come out of the McMinnville road—property which the Government sold and for which it holds the bonded securities of the Chattanooga road.

It has been stated that this whole matter was adjudicated in the suit in the United States circuit court between the Government and the McMinnville road upon the indebtedness. I do not so understand. I am not familiar with the statutes of Tennessee, I am not familiar with the practice in the courts of Tennessee, but I am told by gentlemen who are familiar with them that, as a matter of fact, there was no adjudication and no attempt at an adjudication of this matter. I am told that under the practice of the courts of Tennessee, this being a matter of unliquidated damages, it could not have been offset against the claim of the Government. If I am wrong in this there are gentlemen upon this floor competent to correct me and to correct any erroneous impression that my statement may make upon those who hear me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is this a case of unliquidated damages?

Mr. LYMAN. I think so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thought it was a case of goods taken—a case of trover and conversion.

Mr. LYMAN. Well, perhaps I have been unfortunate again in choosing my words. It is certainly a claim for a debt the amount of which is not settled. I am not so particular in the use of language as some other gentlemen may be able to be.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that this judgment was rendered not in a court of Tennessee, but in a circuit court of the United States.

Mr. LYMAN. For the district of Tennessee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to ask the gentleman this further question, if he knows whether in point of fact this claim was put in as a set-off or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was not.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If not, why not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Because it could not be, being unliquidated damages.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But you say it is a claim for spikes and railroad iron and such things. Now, it is one thing or the other; which is it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If it is the one, it comes under the war clause.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is a debt the amount of which has not been settled by note or contract between the parties.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but arising upon a claim for articles taken, and therefore pleadable.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, if I have any further time I reserve it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I am a little surprised at the course the debate on this question has taken. I was not expecting that any attack would be made upon this measure upon the idea that the question of loyalty was involved, and I am a little astonished that my amiable colleague on the committee [Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana] has been able to get himself into such a passion upon that subject. I do not think that question enters into this controversy in any shape. This is purely a business proposition, as has been clearly shown by my colleague on the committee [Mr. LYMAN].

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman explain why a corporation that has used its property to aid the rebellion should not stand on the same footing as an individual who has done the same?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, I will answer that; not admitting, however, the gentleman's premises.

Mr. HOUK. I ask my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to give me a minute in which to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will.

Mr. HOUK. It has been stated by gentlemen opposing this bill that there was nothing of that road but the road-bed and some iron, that the road was not being operated. Now, if that was so, how could it have been engaged in aiding the rebellion?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Do you want me to answer that?

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir. I want to know how a dead piece of iron could aid the rebellion?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. You yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee to ask me a question, and I insist that I should be allowed to answer it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You will have half an hour of your own time to answer it.

Mr. HOUK (to Mr. RICHARDSON). Give him a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, go on.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That road, while the confederacy had control of it, was an active agent of the confederacy; and when the Union army came in sight the engines and rolling stock were sent south and the bridges burned behind them.

Mr. HOUK. Let me say to the gentleman that the rebel forces may have taken charge of the road and its property as our army did in similar cases, but no officer of that road ever gave his sanction to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Never.

Mr. HOUK. The record does not show anything of that kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman's whole speech was entirely outside of the question, for, as the gentleman says, "the record does not show anything of that kind."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Tennessee say the record does not show that this road was used in the interest of the confederacy?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say that has nothing to do with this question. I concede that the rolling stock of this company may have been taken South; but that the officers of the road had anything to do with it I most emphatically deny. There is not one word in this record from beginning to end that shows the officers of this road moved one engine, one car, or any portion of its movable property South during the war. If there is any such thing in this record, I have read it wrongly from beginning to end. But no such evidence can be produced; it is not there.

That the movable property of this road, or at least a portion of it, was taken South may be true, because, Mr. Chairman, when the confederate army retreated from Tennessee if there was anything it needed more than men and arms it was engines and rolling stock for railroads. Hence, under orders of the confederacy, the rolling stock of this road, as of other roads, may have been taken as the army retreated to the South; but my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] will bear me out in the assertion that it was never done with the knowledge or consent of the officers of that road. So much upon the question of loyalty, which, Mr. Chairman, I think ought not to cut any figure in this case.

Now, then, we start out with the report of the Judiciary Committee of the last House and of the Committee on War Claims of the present House in favor of this claim. I wish to assert, however, and to give all possible emphasis to the assertion, that in no sense is this a war claim. The appropriation of this property by the General Government was not an act of war. It was not the taking of rebel property at all. Mr. Chairman, I have very little respect for a man who, having staked his fortunes on the confederate side in that war, comes sneaking around Congress or the Government of the United States after he has lost and asks any kind of reparation. He ought to make himself a good citizen and submit to the laws; but he ought not to come sneaking around and asking any money for the property he lost in the war. There is nothing of that kind in this case.

Here was the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, about 32 miles in length. As has been stated, it intersected the Nashville and Chattanooga road about 60 miles south of the city of Nashville. The Nashville and Chattanooga road was the main trunk line from Nashville to Chattanooga and down into Georgia. Upon this road all the troops and munitions of war of the Union armies were transported. The little branch line leading from Tullahoma to McMinnville, a distance of 32 miles, was not needed for any such purpose. It was simply an arm intersecting the main line.

Now, in the year 1864, when there was not probably an armed confederate soldier within 100 miles of this road—none nearer than the city of Dalton, Ga.—this little branch road was, under the orders of Generals Rosecrans and Thomas, dismantled. The rails, the spikes, and the chairs upon which the rails rested were taken up and laid upon the line of the Nashville and Chattanooga road, because the Government did not need the branch line, and did need the main line. This appropriation was under the act of January, 1862, which my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN], has caused to be read. Under this act there should have been commissioners appointed to estimate the value of the property thus taken, and thereupon the Government would have made compensation. But the Government failed to appoint commissioners. It did not fail, however, to take the iron and movable property of the road and put it upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road. Now, although the Government failed to appoint commissioners, this failure ought not to be taken advantage of, it occurs to me, when the Government is called upon to make reparation for this appropriation of property.

In 1865, immediately after the close of the war, the officers of the McMinnville and Manchester road made application to General Thomas, then in command of the Department of Tennessee, to have their property restored to them.

This application was not denied, as argued by my colleague on the committee [Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana], but General Thomas referred it to the general superintendent of railroads in the South.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak exactly from the record, and I will ask the Clerk to read this order. I beg you to remember this is an application made by Hon. Horace H. Harrison, Asa Faulkner, and P. H. Marbury. My friend will testify to the loyalty of these men, at least to that of Mr. Harrison and Mr. Faulkner, and, as I remember, to that of Mr. Marbury. They made application to General Thomas to have their property returned to them. It is dated June 26, 1865. In it they say what I ask the Clerk to read from this pamphlet.

The Clerk read as follows:

They further state that during the winter and spring of 1864, under an order from General Grant, the rails, chairs, spikes, switch-stands, turn-tables, &c., for a distance of from 26 to 28 miles were taken up and removed from the road, and used to repair the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. The campaign then in progress, and the bad condition of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, produced a necessity to use the comparatively new rails of our road and the materials referred to, in order that the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad should be made able to sustain the immense trains necessary to move the Army and supplies for the grand campaign then in progress.

Now, however, that the war is virtually ended, the undersigned, in behalf of the stockholders and their brother directors, appeal with confidence to you to repair the road, and replace upon it the iron belonging to the company, which has been removed, or iron and material of equal value.

While we believe that it is but a simple act of justice to restore the property of the company, now that it can be done without detriment to the Government, we believe further that it will promote the great ends of the Government, by preparing the way for the introduction of population and capital, and laying well the foundation of business and social order.

We respectfully ask your earnest and early consideration of, and action on, this matter, and request that you communicate your action herein to Horace H. Harrison, the president of the company, at Nashville.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

HORACE H. HARRISON,
ASA FAULKNER,
P. H. MARBURY.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now ask the Clerk to read the indorsement made by General Thomas upon this application, which he will find on page 2 of the pamphlet.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Indorsed.]

Respectfully referred to Maj. W. J. Stevens, General Superintendent U. S. M. Railroads, M. D. T., who will estimate the cost of placing the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad in the same condition it was in at the time it was destroyed by order of Maj. Gen. W. S. Rosecrans, commanding department of the Cumberland.

By command of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas.

J. L. DONALDSON,
Bvt. Brig. Gen., Chief Q. M.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That having been referred to Major Stevens, in returning it to Major Hibard, engineer of repairs, he made an indorsement, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE, U. S. M. R. R.,
Nashville, July 1, 1865.

Respectfully referred to A. Hibard, engineer of repairs, for information. He will proceed to make estimates at once and report, with return of this paper, to this office.

W. J. STEVENS,
General Superintendent.

True copies of indorsements on this letter.

M. D. WICKERSHAM,
Capt. and A. Q. M., Chief Asst. A. Q. M.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, then, Major Hibard made his report to Major Stevens, and I ask the Clerk to read a portion of that report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In accordance with the instructions indorsed in the inclosed papers, I visited the railroad referred to, examined the condition of the track, length and character of burned bridges, trestle-works, water-tanks, of the entire line. The road is 34½ miles long—running from Tullahoma to McMinnville. The iron has been torn up the entire length, except 8 miles and 5,110 feet at the end next Tullahoma, which is now in running order for trains. Deducting this 8 miles and 5,110 feet from 34½ miles, we have 25½ (very nearly) miles of iron removed and laid down on the Nashville and Chattanooga line.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now read on the next page the approximate estimate he gives.

The Clerk read as follows:

I would give an approximate estimate of the cost, as follows:

Iron for 25½ miles, 62 lbs. per yard, 2,728 tons at $85	$231,880
Chairs, 12,000, at 60 cents	7,200
Spikes, 700 kegs, at $9	6,300
Switches (frogs, levers, gates, &c.)	1,500
Ties, 50,000, at 50 cents	25,000
Removing old ties, cleaning ditches and cuts, regrading and laying track, at $1,000 per mile	25,500
	297,380
Engine house, station house, turn-table, and water-tanks at McMinnville	6,000
Repairing of depot at Manchester, water-tanks six miles from Tullahoma, &c.	1,500
Running 500 feet truss bridging, at $70 per foot	35,000
Reconstruction and repairs of 700 feet of trestle, bridging, and culverts	7,000
	346,880

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the Clerk to turn over the paper to the next page, and instead of finding, as argued by my friend from Indiana, that General Thomas said these people were all a set of rebels and ought to be kicked out, he will find a different statement was made by General Thomas. This report of Major Hibard was sent to General Thomas's headquarters, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROADS,
Nashville, July 20, 1865.

Respectfully returned to Bvt. Maj. Gen. J. L. Donaldson, chief quartermaster military division of the Tennessee, calling attention to the inclosed report and estimates of A. Hibard, chief engineer of construction and repairs, who estimates the cost of repairing and putting the road in running order at $346,880, but to restore the property removed and destroyed by military order will probably cost not to exceed $285,000. No trestle-works or culverts were destroyed by the United States forces. No cross-ties were removed, and only 390 feet of bridges burned by order of the United States officers.

W. J. STEVENS,
General Superintendent.

A true copy:

M. D. WICKERSHAM,
Capt. and A. Q. M., Chief Asst. Q. M. M. D. T.

Respectfully forwarded to Mr. Horace Harrison and others for their information. The original papers have been referred to the Quartermaster-General, and the recommendation that the articles taken from the road be returned.

By command of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas.

J. L. DONALDSON,
Brevet Maj. Gen. and Chief A. Q. M. M. D. T.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So that instead of refusing you will see that General Thomas in 1865—not in 1867 nor in November—but in 1865, July 20, ordered this very property to be returned.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I know the gentleman from Tennessee wants to treat the subject fairly. The gentleman has evidently misunderstood what I said. I did not say he refused to let the road be returned to these parties, but he refused to allow them anything upon the debt for this iron which had been taken.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now I will come to that. The report from which the gentleman read, the report of General Thomas in reference to these Southern roads, does not apply to this McMinnville and Manchester road. That order was not made until in November, 1867, two long years after the occasion to which this refers, and that order made at the date the gentleman quoted did not apply, and was not intended to apply, to the McMinnville road, as the gentleman from Indiana will find by examining the record, but applied generally to Southern railroads.

Now, after this report was submitted to General Thomas, who directed the property to be returned, General Meigs, Quartermaster-General, as I have in the report here, says—

That it is impossible to return this identical iron; that it would be impracticable to do so, and that only compensation could be made for it.

And he says that there should have been an award by a commission in accordance with chapter 15, of section 3, of the act of the 31st of January, 1862, which was read by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN].

I want to state that the only objection which has been urged by this careful and painstaking officer General Meigs was, as I have shown, that it was impracticable to return the iron which had been taken from the road, and he suggested that it could only be paid for under the act to which I have already referred.

Now, I say the question of loyalty does not enter into the case at all; but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it does just here appear in the record which my friend from Indiana had that the officers were loyal. Just here it appears by attestation of the general in command there that Mr. Harrison was a loyal man. A. L. Donaldson, brevet brigadier-general, in indorsing the paper, used the following language:

Forwarded with the approval of the commanding officer, * * * and he hereby attests the loyalty of the president of the company, Horace H. Harrison.

So the gentleman from Indiana raised a question of loyalty which was not in the record, and was not necessary in the consideration of this case, and in which I respectfully submit he is not borne out by the record.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. We will see after a while whether it is in the record or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In this connection I also read from the report of General McCallum, general manager of the United States military railroads, in which he says, "the Government can not return the iron, as it has none," but he adds, "it would appear that this case comes under the provisions of the law of January 31, 1862."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen and will not be denied that the Government took this property from this railroad company and that it converted it to its own use. The answer was made, and I submit it was not the only one made until my friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] attempted to answer it here, that "we took the property and could not return it." Your remedy, says General Meigs, is under the act of Congress of January 31, 1862, and that remedy you must pursue.

That act contemplated the appointment of a board of commissioners by the President of the United States to value the property of railroads thus taken, and for which the Government would make compensation. But in this case no board of commissioners ever took any action in the matter, and none ever assessed the value of the property thus taken. The Judiciary Committee of the last House and the War Claims Committee of the present House both say that this appropriation of this property by the Government was not an act of war, and was not a destruction of rebel property. If it were either we would not insist that the Government is liable therefor. I would not be here asserting that the Government should pay for it if it had destroyed it as an act of war or had it been the destruction of rebel property.

I have already laid down the principle which should govern the determination of this case. But, Mr. Chairman, the proof shows that this property was taken by the Government from the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad and carried over and placed upon the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad line. The facts are, the former road was a branch road or arm intersecting the latter road at Tullahoma; that the former road was about 31 miles long, running from Tullahoma to McMinnville. The latter road was the main line from Nashville to the South by way of Chattanooga. Upon this line the iron of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad was laid by the Government after its removal.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, if this was all, if the Government had simply taken this property in order that they might remove it from the branch road, which they did not need, and put it down upon the main line, which they did need, and if they did use it during the war, and at the close of the war had simply left it there, I would not then have insisted that the Government ought to pay for it. But that is not the fact. That is not all the case. I know that this seizure of property was then a military necessity; that the Government needed the main line of the road upon which to transport its troops and munitions of war, while it did not need the branch line. But conceding all this to be true, I submit that what follows shows that the Government is clearly liable to the claimants here.

This property was bodily transferred from the line of the McMinnville road and put upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road, and was after the close of the war sold by the Government of the United States to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and to-day the Government holds the obligations of the latter road for this identical property. That being the case, ought you not to pay for it? Ought it not to be paid for, no matter if there was a question of loyalty involved? If the Government took the property because it needed it, it may not and possibly ought not to pay for it; but if it took it because it needed it, and used it, and afterward sold it and got the money for it, will you say that the Government under these circumstances ought not to pay for it?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Tennessee say that the Government sold this iron to the Chattanooga Railroad Company?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Does the record show it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does; by the sworn testimony of several witnesses.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I wish you would turn to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will as I come to it. I ask, Can the Government take the property of a citizen, use it for a time, sell it to a third party, and refuse to account to the party from whom the property was taken for its reasonable value? That is this case. There can be no avoiding the issue as thus presented. That the property was taken I have clearly shown, and not as an act of war. That it was put down on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad the proof in the record clearly shows. As a part of the testimony to this effect I will here read the depositions of A. Powers and T. Mahoney, who said they counted and identified the iron rails after they were placed on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad.

A. Powers and S. S. Mahoney, being sworn, depose and say: That they are now, and before the late war were, well acquainted with the line of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, its road-bed, and the iron laid upon the same; that during the late war the said road with the greater part of its machinery and property was occupied by the United States forces; that previous to said capture the said affiants were employed on the said road; that a large amount of the iron rails of said road were by the forces and authority of the United States taken up and removed. That said affiants have carefully examined a quantity of the iron rails now held by the United States in the hands of Capt. and Bvt. Maj. S. S. Hammill, assistant quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., and from such examination they find that of rails so held by the United States two hundred and seventy rails or bars belong to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and are, as affiants believe, part and parcel of the same rails taken up and removed from the road-bed of the said company as above stated.

That shows they identified and counted a number of these rails which they were able to identify, having been workingmen on the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, and they testify to the peculiarity of the rails. I want now to show that when these affidavits were submitted to Captain Hammill, the officer referred to there, it was his recommendation that this iron should be returned to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad:

OFFICE ASSISTANT QUARTERMASTER, Nashville, August 6, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to Brig. Gen. W. D. Whipple, chief of staff M. D. C., with the recommendation that he be authorized to return the iron.

S. R. HAMMILL,
Capt. and Asst. Quartermaster, Brevet Major of United States Volunteers.

It will not be necessary to produce all the proof on this point. The fact was never controverted. I have in my hand a record of some litigation between the McMinnville and Manchester and the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroads. The record is full of proof on that point. It is not all pertinent, and I do not care to encumber the RECORD with it. General Meigs says it appears from the proof that all this iron was laid on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. I have here before me his letter to the Secretary of War in April, 1874. I do not know that it is necessary to read it all, but will read a small portion thereof. He says, on page 46 of this record:

The iron taken from the road was laid on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and I am informed that a suit is pending against that company, with the prospect, it is said, that a judgment will be rendered in favor of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company. * * * .

Now, then, when the war closed the Government was in possession of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and assumed to be the owner of the line, the rails upon it, and other property along its line. On the 30th day of November, 1865, the Government sold to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad rolling stock, the rails it had laid down, including the rails taken from the McMinville and Manchester Railroad, and other property then on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and took the obligation of the road for $1,587,157.07, and to-day holds the bond of the road for a balance due of about $500,000, the whole debt having been thus reduced by payments by the railroad company and by some adjustment of said indebtedness under the act of March 3, 1871.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Where does the record show that they sold the rails that were laid down?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to read only a portion of the bond executed by the Nashville and Chattanooga road to the Government for the property it purchased at that sale, and which will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is that a part of the record?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is. I am not sure that the entire bond is copied into the record.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. When I asked the gentleman for the papers he did not turn that over to me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. At my desk I read to the gentleman from this very bond. After setting out the amount, the penaly of the bond, something over $3,000,000, being double the amount of the real indebtedness thus incurred, it reads:

The nature of the above obligation is such, that whereas the above bounden railroad has purchased and received, or shall receive, from the War Department of the United States rolling stock, iron rails, cross-ties, chairs, spikes, timber, and other material for repairing and operating its railroad in quantities, at prices, and to amount and value which shall be evidenced by the receipts given by said railroad company, &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under this bond the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad became liable to the Government for $1,587,000, the iron rails therein referred to being in part those taken from the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad. I want to say in all fairness that under the act of 1871 there was a compromise and an adjustment with the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad of part of its indebtedness. For when it made this purchase from the Government it made it at extremely high figures, as we all know. Everything was inflated, and prices were very high. But in 1871 there was an adjustment of indebtness of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and they paid $500,000 in pursuance of that adjustment, and to-day they owe the Government the remainder of $500,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having taken this property, having laid it down upon the line of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, having sold it to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, and having received and now holding the obligation of the latter road for the amount, it is not in good grace for the Government of the United States to come forward and say that this property was taken as an act of war and we will not pay for it. And, in fact, the Government never has made that assertion by any officer that I ever heard of. Nor did I ever hear the assertion from any source until I heard it to-day from the lips of my amiable and distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON]. It is proper to say, Mr. Chairman, that the McMinville and Manchester road, the little branch line, finding itself dismantled at the close of the war, also made a purchase from the Government. It purchased, as has been stated here, $20,000 worth of rolling stock and property at one time, and afterward $26,000 worth more, making $46,000. That was in 1865. That debt to-day is in judgment. I have the letter of the clerk of the circuit court of the United States at Nashville to show that that indebtedness is now evidenced by a judgment for the sum of $98,000 and odd dollars, rendered, if I am not mistaken, on the 24th day of May, 1884. I have the letter, but it is not important to be entirely accurate about the date.

That debt, as this letter shows, is in judgment, and is now due to the United States, with interest since its rendition, except $5,000, which has been paid; so that the McMinville and Manchester road now owes the Government of the United States a judgment rendered at Nashville, which, with interest, will amount to about $108,000 or $110,000. Now, what we propose in this bill is that the Government of the United States account to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company for $246,000, and deduct from that amount the amount of the judgment rendered at Nashville, which, with interest, is about $110,000. That will leave $135,000 or $136,000 as the net result, the balance due from the Government to the McMinnville and Manchester road.

We do not ask that this amount be paid in money; we do not ask any appropriation to pay it; we simply ask, inasmuch as the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company is now willing to accept the bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company due to the Government, that the latter's indebtedness be thus credited. That is all. It will still leave a balance of nearly $400,000 due from the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company to the Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that this is a fair and honest transaction. I undertake to say that the Government has made similar settlements with other Southern railroads. If gentlemen will recur to the report submitted, they will find a correspondence between the late Secretary of War, Mr. Lincoln, and a former member of this House from Tennessee, General Dibrell, which they will find developed the fact that exactly a similar settlement to the one asked here has been made by the Government with the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad Company and with the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company. I mention this that gentlemen of the committee may see there are precedents for such settlements. But if it be right we need no precedent. The letters and correspondence showing these precedents are attached to this report.

Mr. Chairman, much was said by my colleague on the committee [Mr. JOHNSTON] in regard to this being captured property, and he made a number of other assertions which I do not care to discuss at this time, because I think the statement I have made shows the whole transaction exactly from beginning to end. I wish to say, in conclusion, that it is manifestly just to make this settlement.

Before closing I want to call attention to one other fact. The indebtedness of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company to the Government and the indebtedness of the McMinnville Railroad Company to the Government have both borne interest since 1865, and they are to-day bearing interest. The amount asked for in this bill, $246,000, is the sworn value of the movable property taken from the McMinnville road and placed upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road in 1865, and it bears no interest. The Government, therefore, has been getting interest upon its debt, while it pays no interest upon the debt due to the railroad company.

I want to say further that there is nothing in this bill which authorizes payment for any fixed property. The proof shows that there was $346,000 worth of property destroyed and taken from the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company; but your committee have struck out $100,000, which covered the value of cross-ties, bridges, tanks, and trestle-work and other fixed property, and only left the railroad iron, spikes, and chairs which were removed to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and which the sworn testimony submitted shows amounted at that time to $246,000. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that he had approved the joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report, and the joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John H. Slater.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

M'MINNVILLE AND MANCHESTER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I want to express upon the threshold of this discussion, so far as I am to participate in it, a more than ordinary regret that we should be compelled in the discharge of our duties here to investigate private claims of this class. I regret that this case is here. I regret it more keenly because of my high personal regard for the gentlemen who have manifested an interest in the measure not only in committee but on the floor of the House. It is, therefore, not a pleasant duty for me to oppose the allowance of this claim.

But, sir, the claim is one that alarms me. It is one of such a nature that if allowed is startling. It is new before the War Claims Committee and new in this House. I have not expected heretofore to live to see the time when a claim of this kind would be seriously pressed before the American Congress. But in my brief Congressional career I am confronted with it, and am therefore compelled to say, in the language of the gentlemen who are endeavoring to sustain it, that it is not a war claim. It is not a war claim in the sense of any war claim that has ever been recognized or seriously considered or ever allowed in this House. It comes here without a redeeming trait. It is one of the most obnoxious measures that could be presented as an entering-wedge for a class of claims which in amount would aggregate a sum, I think, quite equal to the national debt at the close of the war.

When I saw that this claim was to be seriously presented, and after I got over the first shock, and felt a little amused about it, I felt as, I presume, a distinguished judge in my State generally felt in opening court. "Sheriff," said he, "hoist the gate and let her rip!" [Laughter.] I felt that if this claim is to be allowed, then our good friends from Tennessee have not only got their two bills, in which I heartily agreed with them, covering two thousand claimants of small claims and aggregating about one-half million of dollars, but if this claim can be allowed, then hereafter allowances will not be confined to the good State of Tennessee.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not a fact that the two bills of which the gentleman speaks embraced claims from Ohio, from Indiana, from West Virginia, from Maryland, from Missouri, and from other States?

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, yes. I believe New York received about $1.50. But Tennessee received more than half of both those bills. I am not speaking of those claims disparagingly. I am a friend of those claims. I speak in the interest of others of that class.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it the number or the amount of the claims that makes them unjust?

Mr. GEDDES. Not at all. I am going to speak of the interest of these claimants who would have a reproach brought upon them by the allowance of this claim.

What is this claim? Not by a conflict in the proof through which I must grope my way and gather and weigh the facts, but by the admission of the claimant all through the record, this comes within a class of claims that Congress has never seriously thought of recognizing. On the Calendar as on the face of the bill this is denominated "A bill directing the Quartermaster-General to settle"—mark the word, "settle—"with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company." Yet the bill contains a finding of the amount and an order for the payment of $246,880! If handing my agent a ten-dollar bill and telling him to hand it to John Smith is an authority to him to go and "settle" with John Smith, then the title of this bill is correct, not otherwise.

Gentlemen say this claim does not result from any act of war. Let us see. Your own testimony out of the mouths of your own officials is all the evidence I ask upon which to base the grounds of my objection to this bill. The claim is for ravages of war—pure, simple, and clean cut. There is no other feature to redeem it; there is no cloak thrown around it. The men who present the claim here are too manly to hide behind a masked battery. They come up here boldly and manfully and say, "By ravages of war you got our property; by capture in war and by right of capture you had it; and we want you now to pay us for it." That is what they say.

How did the loss occur? In my anxiety to be right on this question I have read with the utmost care every word and every line in the record; and I followed the speech of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] with the same anxiety and the same interest to see where, out of that record, he would gather a line or a word for the encouragement of any member who might be disposed to vote for the payment of this claim. The gentleman read in part what I have extracted more at large from the record and now have before me. This record contains the statement of the claimants, the directors of this road, in a letter dated June 20, 1865, to Major-General Thomas, then commanding the Department of the Cumberland. This is what the directors of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, the claimants in part in this case, say:

> Your committee would show that by an order from Maj. Gen. W. S. Rosecrans, then commanding the department, Colonel Wilder proceeded to destroy by burning the entire superstructure of the bridges at Hickory Creek and Barren Fork, and the depot buildings at McMinnville and Morrison, and the engine-houses, car-shops, water-tanks, and shop-tools at the terminus of the road at McMinnville. They further state that during the winter and spring of 1864, the rails, spikes, switch-stands, and turn-tables for a distance of from 26 to 28 miles were taken up and removed from the road and used to repair the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. The campaign then in progress and the bad condition of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad produced a necessity to use the comparatively new rails of our road and the materials referred to, in order that the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad should be able to sustain the immense trains necessary to move the Army and supplies for the grand campaign then in progress.

Up to that point what had been the history of this road? I am not here to say a word, as men who know me know I would not, that would bring up from the depths so deep I would have them they never could be reached—to bring up from these depths one lingering unpleasant memory of that war; but when we are reading history, when we are called upon to make payment of a quarter of a million of dollars of money, I may kindly but earnestly say to my friends that this thing that now wants money has a history on record for all time to come. It is said some officer of that road was a loyal man. Admit it; but the management of that road and all its force prior to its absolute capture by the Government forces were in the confederate service.

Mr. HOUK. By force.

Mr. GEDDES. By force down there, of course, after it got there, but it finally became confederate, notwithstanding, in this way—that is, the men in the management of the road, so far as they could control it, yielded an earnest and warm obedience to the confederate authorities so as to advance the interests of the confederate cause.

What did they do? They gave all their means, did all they could up to the time when the Federal Army, marching from the North, was about to invade Tennessee and capture that railroad. And when they saw it would be captured they ran beyond the Union lines all the rolling stock of that road, everything loose from the ground, all they could get up and remove was run off, and, as my friend admits, into the confederate lines.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEDDES. For a question, yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Where is the gentleman's evidence that the McMinnville and Manchester road, by any act of its own, moved an engine or car south?

Mr. McMILLIN. Or consented to it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Or connived at it?

Mr. GEDDES. This road was an ifleality. It was run by men; it was run and operated by material means. It is said to be an ideality, but it is quite a barren ideality at this time. Governor Allen would express it more emphatically.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My friend down there would have found they could not exercise ideality. The railroads were under the control of the Federal Government and that Government removed the rolling stock.

Mr. GEDDES. I will not stop to have words with my friend on that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when all the rolling stock was removed, let it be said it was by confederates, it was removed and nothing left, for General Thomas had already burned down all the station-houses and all the bridges. All these men engaged in military matters know it became necessary immediately to fix up the line of the Nashville and Chattanooga road. It was out of repair. It was insufficient to carry our forces, munitions of war, and all that, and the military authorities took up the loose rails of the McMinnville and Manchester road and carried them to the Nashville and Chattanooga road.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to one more question.

Mr. GEDDES. I am afraid I will have my time consumed, and yet I do not like to refuse.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I merely wish to ask you a question for information.

Mr. GEDDES. Very well, I will yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does this bill ask for the bridges burned and houses destroyed as the ravages of war, or for property taken by the Government and afterward sold by it?

Mr. GEDDES. This does not provide for the portion burned by the military authorities.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Was the portion taken by authority for the use of the Government?

Mr. GEDDES. For the time being everything was converted to the use of the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Was that afterward sold by the Government?

Mr. GEDDES. Not a dollar's worth. There is the point on which I followed my friend—not a dollar's worth of it, as that record shows.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that the record will disclose the fact that the gentleman is mistaken and that the true statement of the case is just the other way.

Mr. GEDDES. My friend has the record before him; he has already made use of it, and he will have his own time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And I read a portion of that record here upon that very point.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me read further: On August 3, 1866, the president of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company applied to the Quartermaster-General for two hundred and seventy bars of railroad iron claimed to be identified as the iron which had been removed from that road, and in that application for the return of that iron the president of the road makes this statement:

It was captured by the United States forces during the late rebellion, and is now in your possession.

Mr. HOUK. Whose possession?

Mr. GEDDES. The Government—the military authoritories representing the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When was that made?

Mr. GEDDES. August 3, 1866.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But what is the date of the statement?

Mr. GEDDES. On page 37 of your record, to sustain this claim of the president of that road, they submitted two affidavits, and in that affidavit—a single affidavit, but subscribed by two persons—I find this statement bearing upon this question:

During the late war the said road, with the greater part of its machinery and property, was captured by the United States forces; and that previous to said capture affiants were employed upon said road; that a large amount of iron rails of said road were by said forces and authority of the United States taken up and removed.

Now, out of their own record there is the situation, there are the circumstances under which this property was taken; by capture. What right, then, does that confer? What claim have you to it now? If you have a good one I will follow you.

Now, I think we will all admit that there is a damage resulting from war, such as is here described, for which no compensation ever has been or ever can be made. Let me name three classes for which no government on earth ever has or ever will pay, and this is one; and then there is another class in which now and then an occasional case through great hardships will slip through and be allowed, but it is always an exceptional case.

What are the cases that are never allowed? First, damage done by the enemy; secondly, damage done to the enemy; and third, damage done by the competent military authority where the war is in progress as it was here, and where that act is dictated by the necessary operations of war, and where it was a wise and judicious measure at the time the property was damaged.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me ask the gentleman a question just there.

Mr. GEDDES. If you will give me, of the time remaining to you, such as I may desire to close my remarks I will yield for any question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not wish to disarrange your argument, but I will certainly yield to the gentleman as much time as I occupy, and think the committee will grant him all the time that he wants.

Mr. GEDDES. If I can have the time I will cheerfully yield for any question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do I understand you to maintain that because this property was captured by the Army that the Government ought not to pay for it? And, if so, I ask another question, and I hope you will make clear to my mind this distinction, for I want to see the difference between capturing that iron and putting it on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad and using it by the Government and then selling it back to the railroad, and the taking by the Government of a horse, a mule, or a beef from a loyal citizen and using it for Government purposes? Where is the distinction? What is the difference? Or if you drive in and capture a load of corn, and take it from a citizen who is loyal to the Government——

Mr. GEDDES. Well, you are making a rather lengthy question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Because I want you to point out to me the difference in the two cases to which I have referred—why it is that in the one case you would refuse payment and in the other case recommend it.

Mr. GEDDES. I will give you Congressional legislation since the organization of this Government in unbroken line of precedent staring you in the face against a case like this. I say that property damaged or destroyed or captured as the result and on the theater of war in loyal States or in the enemy's country by military operations and as a military necessity the Government never has paid for. Why? Because these are the well-recognized ordinary operations of war. They are the natural consequences of war. They may be harsh. How full of harshness is the whole history of our country from the beginning of the war down to this hour; and as to all your losses, as to our losses, as to all the Government losses, I regret them equally with you.

How, then, was it done? Why it was done in the prosecution of the war as an act of self-defense. An army moving may of necessity damage and destroy property, just as I may in the defense of my person injure the property or person of another. An army in its march may seize and destroy cotton-bales or timber or railroads or anything else required by the public safety.

Under what circumstances may this be done? When it obstructs or impedes the march of the army, or if it would facilitate the progress and ultimate success of the army, or if it is found to be property that would strengthen one army or weaken or cripple the other. Under the circumstances they are the proper subject-matter of war and the ravages of war. And war was carried on without regard to cost during our late struggle.

With my little experience on the War Claims Committee, now running thus far into a third Congress, I learn that perhaps much the greatest damage done during the war for which claims have hitherto been filed was to loyal persons, but rendered necessary to aid military operations; sometimes to prevent property from falling into the hands of the enemy and becoming useful to the enemy. This caused immense destruction. It was resorted to as a means of warfare on both sides. Why, sir, in our records we have evidence that the Southern confederacy destroyed perhaps two hundred millions of dollars' worth of cotton to keep it from falling into the hands of the Federal forces. The Federal Army also destroyed millions of property of loyal men to keep it from falling into the hands of the confederate forces.

Why, sir, let me refresh the memory of some of you who have been here for a number of years by calling familiar names of cases of great hardship. There was Dr. J. Milton Best, in Tennessee. There was Thomas B. Wallace, of Missouri. There was the East Tennessee University. There were the Manchester and Kentucky salt-works. There was the Torrey mill, in the Shenandoah Valley, that in the Forty-seventh or Forty-eighth Congress, with a heart almost sick, I had to report against. A loyal man, with all he had invested in the mill property, stored with flour and with wheat; and the Union forces, finding it would be taken the next day by the confederate forces, burned it to ashes and left that man in poverty. All these have had adverse reports upon our Calendar.

I am not going to enumerate all these cases. It would take my hour to do it. Around this very city are some of the hardest cases. An old man far up in years, who can live but a little time, came to my room the other night with tears in his eyes. His farm had been taken, timber cut, ditches dug—his property absolutely destroyed. And he was a loyal man, but payment has always been refused him. He wanted to know whether there was any hope for these men who had endured such sacrifices in the cause of the Union. I was compelled to say I saw no hope.

But if you jump over all these cases and pay a railroad company for ravages like this, you will need no bills to reduce revenue. On the contrary, you will pile up over and above the present indebtedness of the Government a sum more than equal to the debt at the close of the war. So I say to gentlemen, in all frankness and good-will, if we are to override international law, if we are to override the usages of civilized nations, if we are to override the well-settled Congressional legislation of this country, I do not want to begin here on this claim or on a claim of this class. I say to you gentlemen who are pressing it that if by any possibility this House could be induced to recognize it, it would bring such a reproach, such a blighting, burning stigma upon righteous and just claims that no man need apprehend or hope that he can get even a good claim hereafter.

To justify what I have said I want to invite attention to how this corporation was treated by the Government after the war to show you that the Government toward this claimant has not been a hard master. The Government acted generously and magnanimously. It sought to build up the waste places of Tennessee, and it encouraged this road to peace and to reconciliation and to prosperity. The very first act was a request of the president of this road upon the Government for the return by the military authorities of all the property removed which they could identify to this McMinnville road, and the military authorities returned it.

Now, what more did the Government do? This company said it had suffered by the war and wanted the Government to advance some means to enable it to purchase the rolling stock so it could reorganize and refit its road for usefulness to the Government and to the State. Now, what did the Government do? They loaned them the money which they are now seeking to avoid the payment of; and in the bond given for the payment of that which was partially read by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is this statement—and that was in 1865:

Whereas the said railroad company desires and by these presents intends to secure to the United States the complete and punctual payment as aforesaid of the amounts which may be due for the said materials received or to be received by it from the United States.

Two years rolled around and they could not make payment. They wanted further time. They appealed to the Government. The Government generously and magnanimously granted it. They said, "Give us this much more time and we will pay to you according to the condition of the bond every dollar of indebtedness."

How was the Government treated in return by this company? What did this company do in return for all the generosity of the Government? They did this: The road was sold under a decree of the court in favor of the State of Tennessee to the second company named here, the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. Later on this other company, the real beneficiary of this bill, as the gentleman has put it, somehow or other came in under this second company that had bought the road.

By the terms of the original contract the road was to carry the mail and the compensation for that service was to be applied upon the indebtedness to the Government. This new company refused to carry the mail, and notified the Department that they would not do it. For what reason? Let me read to you out of their own mouths, for I quote here almost exclusively from their own declarations, in order that no question of fact may arise. On page 52 of this document you will find that the Quartermaster-General says:

On the 15th of July, 1871, the State of Tennessee sold this road under its statutory lien to this company, and it resold it to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. On the 3d of June, 1873, the president of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company submitted to the Postmaster-General a statement of the circumstances under which that company had purchased the road.

Here is the statement:

My board of directors have instructed me to say, unless compensation is made this company for transporting the mails over the road, the same will be discontinued after the 1st of July next.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the date of that?

Mr. GEDDES. July, 1873.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Eight years after the close of the war.

Mr. GEDDES. July, 1873, the Quartermaster-General was notified by the Assistant Postmaster-General that the postal service had been discontinued by this company. In a statement of an officer of the road to the Quartermaster-General, justifying the discontinuance of the service, he gives this reason:

Relative to the account for transport of stores over the McMinnville and Manchester road, we desire to say that the amount should not be placed to the credit of the McMinnville road, as they are not recognized in the transaction at all, and have now no connection whatever with the road.

It is owned and operated exclusively by the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. To this the Quartermaster-General replied modestly.

The Government claims a lien upon the postal and transportation earnings of the road by virtue of a contract made in 1866. It also claims that the sale of the road by order of the State court in a suit in which the United States was not, and could not, be a party does not affect the rights of the Government in this respect.

Then the president of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, which had become the purchaser, wrote as follows to the Quartermaster on the 20th of August, 1874:

I will state that the declination of this company to carry the mail was for the simple reason that it considers it unjust to have them do service and another company get the compensation therefor, and we do not think it a sound legal proposition that the earnings of the road, whether for the mail or other service, should be taken from the present owners of the property and applied to a debt due the Government from those who formerly owned it; and the more especially is this true when the property has been sold under a decree of the court.

To this the Quartermaster replies:

The conditions, in part, under which the property was sold were that the earnings should go to the liquidation of the debt. The Government only insists that these conditions shall be observed. The sale of the road by the State of Tennessee does not, we think, change the rights of the Government in this respect. The Government was in possession, and the owner by right of capture, of the road at the time of the sale of the property and the restoration of the road to its former owners, which sale and restoration were made upon conditions which have not been fulfilled.

In the last report of the Quarermaster-General, which I have before me, I find this condition of things set forth: After the war the Government sold to fifty Southern and Southwestern railroad companies property amounting to over $6,000,000. Of these fifty roads that thus became debtors to the Government forty-six have paid in full or have compromised manfully, leaving four out of the fifty still standing as debtors upon the books of the Government, and this McMinnville and Manchester road is one of the four. And, Mr. Chairman, mark the reason given why the purchasers of the road should not carry the mail. It was that they had bought on an execution and that therefore the Government had no claim, because they had no connection with the original company.

Is not this blowing hot and cold? Is it not playing the old game, "Heads, I win; tails, you lose?" They would not carry the mail because they had no connection with the original company, but they now want us to pay them $140,000 as the beneficiaries under this bill upon the ground that they are the successors of that old company.

That is all there is of it; that is the case plainly and squarely put from their own record. Now, let me read from the statement of the gentleman who was made under military authority the collecting power to gather up the money from all these fifty roads, forty-six of them having paid. Let us see what he says. I do not quote it all, for he uses some words so harsh, some language so strong, that if I should read it some friend might say that its tendency was to excite some of the bitterness growing out of the late war. What I shall read is from the report made to General Thomas, and by General Thomas indorsed and sent to the Secretary of War. While some of the language is too strong for me to read, I quote what seems sufficient upon this point:

I took charge of the collection of the indebtedness February 1, 1866, in obedience to special order No. 11. In almost every case the management of the roads had been closely identified with the initiation of the rebellion, and they had contributed to sustain it against the Government both by the influence and the means of the companies. While their roads were occupied by the confederates they had strained their capacity in the concentration of troops and supplies; and no class of men were louder in their defiance of the power of the United States.

When the strong arm of the Government forced the confederacy to retire from their roads, the management of the roads aided them in removing the munitions of war, and afterward retired behind the new line of the rebellion, taking with them as much of the property of the roads as they could.

I say this puts the case in the mildest form that a man anxious to obliterate and wipe out forever the unpleasant memories of the war can adopt.

Mr. RICHARDSON. From what page does the gentleman read?

Mr. GEDDES. This passage is toward the last of the record, immediately preceding the report of General Thomas.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman say that the language he has read is applied particularly to the McMinnville and Manchester road, or any road specially concerned in this case? Is it not applied to the roads of the South generally?

Mr. GEDDES. It is; that is the way I read it. General Thomas, in submitting this report to the Secretary of War, used the following language:

The attention of the honorable Secretary of War is respectfully invited to this report as giving a complete statement of the indebtedness of the Southern railroads to the United States at this time and of the efforts of some of them to evade or defer payment.

I can only recommend that the Government hold these roads to their contract; that they be compelled to liquidate their indebtedness upon the terms now agreed upon, without consideration or recognition in the least degree of any claims for damages or use by occupation of the United States, such claims being believed to be without foundation in justice or right.

Now, I have not felt called upon to quote at greater length from these records in the presence of my friends here in order to establish fully the real facts in this case as I claim them to exist. In the remaining time allowed me I want to cite some authorities to show the uniform legislation of Congress and the well-settled principles of international law in relation to this question.

The facts in this case being clearly established, the only question remaining is as to the rights of the claimant and the duty of the Government to it growing out of the facts stated.

We do not recognize any obligation on the part of the Government to make compensation for the property of a loyal citizen, in a loyal State, which was destroyed or damaged by competent and duly authorized military authority in advance of a battle or to facilitate the movements and efficiency of our Army or in the conflict to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy.

It may be safely asserted that the policy and practice of the civilized world has been against the payment of such claims. The principle most generally recognized by public law and the law of nations will be found against the policy of making compensation in claims of this class. The cases are so rare where compensation has been granted as to prove them clearly exceptional.

The general principle of international law and good morals on which the general practice has been based is not affected by extraordinary exceptional cases. It is the general and well-established principle, recognized and enforced by public law and the moral sense of the civilized world, that we are called upon to follow.

Many reasons will occur at a single glance why this policy and principle should be firmly established. If the Government should be made liable under such circumstances it might sometimes induce a financially embarrassed nation to avoid the best, and perhaps the only, means of preserving its existence.

All recognize and admit the sacredness of the rights of property in time of peace. The absolute supremacy of the laws of peace over military power in time of peace can not be too highly estimated or commended. Every student of law and history is familiar with the celebrated maxim of the English law that "every man's house is his castle."

Lord Chatham illustrated this celebrated maxim of the English law by an impressive eulogy, in which he said of it:

The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the forces of the crown. It may be frail, its roof may shake, the wind may blow through it, the storm may enter, the rain may enter, but the King of England can not enter, all his forces dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement.

In time of war the same sacred principle recognizes and permits the destruction of property when the preservation of a community or country requires it. Self-preservation as applied to individuals or a nation is governed by a law of overruling necessity. It is a law for peace and war, and may be justly exercised by military and civil authorities.

Vattel recognizes this law of necessity in time of war as follows:

But there are other damages caused by inevitable necessity, as for instance the destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from the enemy. These are merely accidents. They are misfortunes which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they fall.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania has also had occasion to recognize this principle of necessity in time of war, as follows:

Many things are lawful in that season (flagrante bello) which would not be permitted in time of peace. The rights of necessity form a part of our law.

The supreme court of New Jersey set forth the principle as follows:

But the right to destroy property to prevent the spread of a conflagration rests upon other and very different grounds. It has no necessary connection with or dependence upon the sovereign power. It is a natural right, existing independently of civil government.

It is both anterior and superior to the rights derived from the civil compact. It springs not from any right of property claimed or exercised by the agent of destruction in the property destroyed, but in the law of necessity.

The principle applies as well to personal property as to real estate, to goods as to houses, to life as to property, in solitude as in a crowded city, in a state of nature as in civil society.

It is referred by moralists and by jurists to the same great principle which justifies the exclusive appropriation of a plank in a shipwreck, though the life of another be sacrificed; with the throwing overboard of goods in a tempest for the safety of the vessel; with the taking of food to satisfy the immediate demands of hunger.

The principle which is applicable and should govern in this class of cases may be found forcibly illustrated in a report made in the Senate of the United States in the Forty-fifth Congress, one paragraph of which is as follows:

The conflagration of Moscow, the laying Holland under water by destroying the dikes, the destruction of Athens when the people took to their ships, were not exercises of the rights of eminent domain. They were the acts of self-defense of nations in a death-struggle, justified only by that overwhelming necessity of self-preservation which, for the time being, exonerates individuals and nations from all legal restraint whatever.

I invite further attention to the case already cited in which the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in a case growing out of the Revolutionary war, said:

During the war of the Revolution Congress had a right to direct the removal of any articles that were necessary to the Continental Army or useful to the enemy, and in danger of falling into their hands. And one whose property so removed was afterward captured by the enemy was held not to be entitled to compensation from the Commonwealth. (1 Dallas, 362.)

During the Revolutionary war property was often destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy or to obstruct the movements of the forces of the enemy, and Congress never made any provision for paying any such claims.

A committee of the House of Representatives made a report February 15, 1797, on a claim for compensation for a dwelling-house burned in Massachusetts, in March, 1776, by order of General Sullivan, commanding the American troops. The house was in possession of British troops, and for the purpose of dislodging them General Sullivan sent troops with orders to set fire to the building, which was done. The committee in that case says:

The loss of houses and other sufferings by the general ravages of war have never been compensated by this or any other Government. In the history of our Revolution sundry decisions of Congress against claims of this nature may be found. Government has not adopted a general rule to compensate individuals who have suffered in a similar manner.

After the war of 1812 with Great Britain the question was frequently presented and the well-settled principles of international law followed. Many of the cases very forcibly illustrate the principle contended for. One case grew out of the landing of the enemy at New Orleans. In order to annoy and weaken the enemy the levee was cut by military authority. As a consequence the plantation of that claimant was inundated and suffered damage estimated at $20,000. But the claim was rejected by Congress on the ground that "the injury was done in the necessary operations of war."

The magnitude of our late civil war, and the circumstances under which the struggle was carried on, led to greater losses of the kind involved here than is usual in war. The contending armies on both sides moved with a view to success without regard to cost, and the loss of life and destruction of property were necessary to that end. With immense armies of equal bravery and skill the struggle will pass into history as one of the most extraordinary known to the records of time. In such a conflict of arms, the control of resources and instrumentalities often changed results for the time being, and frequently secured permanent advantages. Unfortunately this led to the destruction of an immense amount of property. The circumstances demanding the destruction during the continuance of the war were various, but all prompted by the same motive and to accomplish a common end.

The property of loyal citizens in loyal States was, unfortunately for them, often so situated as likely to fall into the hands of the enemy, and was of a kind to be immediately useful to them. To prevent such a military advantage to the enemy the Federal Army of necessity, in self-defense, would seize and destroy it. A striking illustration of this kind of destruction resulted from the order issued by General Sheridan in November, 1864, to "destroy all forage and subsistence, burn all barns, mills, and their contents, and drive off all stock in Loudoun County, Virginia," which was executed. A large proportion of the property so destroyed belonged to men of unquestioned loyalty. Congress by act of January 23, 1873, authorized payment for the stock used by the Army, but refused to pass any bill to pay for property destroyed.

The Government has also refused to pay for buildings burned by our troops in West Virginia in 1863 by way of a ruse to mislead and divert the enemy, such act being considered a legitimate act of ordinary warfare. Losses incurred in that way must be classed with those casualities and incidents of war for which the Government does not become liable.

The number and variety of cases growing out of our late war, calling for the application of this highest law of "overruling necessity," could be multiplied from our Congressional legislation. The claims of J. Milton Best, of Paducah, Ky.; Thomas B. Wallace, of Lexington, Mo.; the East Tennessee University, and the Manchester (Ky.) salt-works are leading cases, made prominent by the veto messages of President Grant in 1872 and 1873. The Kentucky salt-works were destroyed by order of General Craft, commanding the Union military forces.

The principle of that message in the last-named case has been so uniformly followed by Congress ever since and is so manifestly applicable to the case under consideration that it should be here repeated. President Grant said:

I understand him to say, in effect, that the salt-works were captured from the rebels, that it was impracticable to hold them, and that they were demolished so as to be of no further use to the enemy.

I can not agree that the owners of property destroyed under such circumstances are entitled to compensation therefor from the United States. Whatever other view may be taken of the subject, it is incontrovertible that these salt-works were destroyed by the Union Army while engaged in regular military operations, and that the sole object of their destruction was to weaken, cripple, or defeat the armies of the so-called southern confederacy.

I am greatly apprehensive that the allowance of this claim could and would be construed into the recognition of a principle binding the United States to pay for all property which their military forces destroyed in the late war for the Union. No liability by the Government to pay for property destroyed by the Union forces in conducting a battle or siege has yet been claimed; but the precedent proposed by this bill leads directly and strongly in that direction; for it is difficult upon any ground of reason or justice to distinguish between a case of that kind and the one under consideration. Had General Craft and his command destroyed the salt-works by shelling out the enemy found in their actual occupancy, the case would not have been different in principle from the one presented in this bill. What possible difference can it make in the rights of owners or the obligations of the Government whether the destruction was in driving the enemy out, or in keeping them out, of the possession of the salt-works?

This bill does not present a case where private property is taken for public use in any sense of the Constitution. It was not taken from the owners but from the enemy; and it was not then used by the Government, but destroyed. Its destruction was one of the casualties of war; and though not happening in actual conflict, was perhaps as disastrous to the rebels as would have been a victory in battle.

Owners of property destroyed to prevent the spread of a conflagration, as a general rule, are not entitled to compensation therefor; and for reasons equally strong, the necessary destruction of property found in the hands of the public enemy, and constituting a part of their military supplies, does not entitle the owner to indemnity from the Government for damages to him in that way.

I fully appreciate the hardship of the case, and would be glad if my convictions of duty allowed me to join in the proposed relief. But I can not consent to the doctrine which is found in this bill, as it seems to me, by which the national Treasury is exposed to all claims for property injured or destroyed by the armies of the United States in the late protracted and destructive war in this country.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 11, 1873.

The flood of bills poured upon the War Claims Committee at this Congress, and this class of claims with other classes which should not be seriously entertained, being presented, has led me into this discussion. It is hardly possible that claims of this nature will ever receive favorable action in this House. Periodical attempts are made to have them approved by Congress. Sometimes a case of great hardship is selected, one appealing to the sympathy of every member of this House, and if recognized as an obligation of the Government the floodgates would be opened and the most alarming increase of the national debt would result. Such legislation would certainly be unpardonable injustice to the people already burdened with as much as they can bear.

This Congress is agitating and endeavoring to mature measures for the relief of the overburdened tax-payer. The laboring element of the country is appealing for relief against unequal and unjust laws. Labor, forming the foundation of our growth, prosperity, and greatness as a nation, must have burdens removed, not multiplied. Never before in our history has it been so essential to limit and ward off burdens, and afford by judicious legislation all possible encouragement to every interest now depressed, as at this time. No measure will afford to the country at large more substantial encouragement than a prompt and emphatic disapproval of the effort made to fasten upon the country an obligation to pay this class of war claims.

As early as 1873 the President, in his message to Congress, said:

Your careful attention is invited to the subject of claims against the Government and to the facilities afforded by existing laws for their prosecution. Probably the largest saving to the national Treasury can be secured by timely legislation on these subjects of any of the economic measures that will be proposed.

The wisdom of this suggestion to Congress has been made manifest by the lapse of time, and as strong and urgent considerations exist now for restraints and safeguards against the danger of unjust claims against the Government as at any period in our history.

Indeed, reasons infinitely stronger and more unanswerable exist now than when President Grant dignified the importance of the question by his message to Congress. If his fear expressed at that time that "not a few of them are fabricated and supported by false testimony" was warranted then, what should be our anxiety and alarm when forced to confront the present number and magnitude of claims with the facilities for fraud, forgery, and perjury which the lapse of time affords to groundless claims.

It is true this ground of objection does not apply to the class of cases to which this one under consideration belongs. Here there is no suspicion of fraud or improper motive. The truthful history of this case has been faithfully preserved and candidly and honestly presented; but if it and all of its kind should be allowed by overriding international law and disregarding the well-settled safeguards thrown around the public Treasury, then it would be a natural and almost inevitable result to throw wide open the door to the payment of other classes of claims against which the wisdom of Congress has hitherto successfully legislated.

Here, then, at the threshold of such a dangerous, ruinous, and vicious policy I enter my humble but earnest protest. For one I will not abandon the great highways of legislation built up from time to time since the war by the deliberate judgment of the people's representatives from all portions of our united country. In our efforts to devise methods to relieve Congress from the consideration of claims no one can be more effective than to stand firmly and "without variableness or shadow of turning" by the policy of the past.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have this bill finished in committee before the committee rises, because if it goes over until next week it will take another day, and as I believe the committee will reject the bill by a large majority, I do not see the necessity of consuming any more time with it. I therefore move the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 51.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. RICHARDSON and Mr. GEDDES.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 65.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. SOWDEN. I renew it.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 70.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum still voting, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state unless the point of no quorum is withdrawn that motion can not be received.

Mr. SPRINGER. Why, that is the very time the motion to rise is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee find itself without a quorum by tellers, it is the duty of the Chair to cause the roll to be called.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I have moved the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order until the point of no quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We are now within seven minutes of the time fixed for the usual Friday recess, and I ask that by unanimous consent the call be dispensed with and the committee rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not concede that the motion is not in order.

Mr. PETTIBONE. You do not object to the request?

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asks that unanimous consent be now granted that the vote shall go over until next Friday; the bill to retain its place upon the Calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

HOME RULE—IRELAND.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the purpose of offering a resolution and for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be read for information.

The SPEAKER. It will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States earnestly sympathizes with the right honorable William E. Gladstone and his associates in their efforts to secure a free parliament for the people of Ireland, and congratulates the people of that hitherto unhappy country upon the prospect of an early and successful termination of their long and patriotic struggle for the right of local self-government.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House is directed to communicate a copy of this resolution to Mr. Gladstone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COX. I object. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentlemen from North Carolina will withdraw his objection and let the resolution go through by a unanimous vote.

Mr. COX. I think this is interfering with the legislation of another country, and I must adhere to the objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection being made, the resolution is not before the House for consideration.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, under the order of the House fixing night sessions for Fridays.

Mr. BYNUM. I have a bridge bill which I desire to report from the Committee on Commerce; and to-morrow being the day fixed for the consideration of such bills, I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion to permit me to do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. BYNUM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4793, a bill (H. R. 7651) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct, operate, and maintain a pile and ponton railway bridge across the Missouri River, near or in the vicinity of Chamberlain, in the Territory of Dakota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 4793 was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has objection been withdrawn to the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it has not been.

Several MEMBERS. "Regular order!"

Mr. STEELE. I would like to present a report——

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois to renew his motion for a recess?

Mr. STEELE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion until I can make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdrew the motion for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Indiana to make a report from the Committee on Commerce. I renew it now, however.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now understands the gentleman from Indiana to request the gentleman to withdraw the motion to permit him to introduce a report.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw it for that purpose.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a resolution making bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs a special order for May 4 and 5; which was referred to the House Calendar.

And then (the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived) the Speaker declared the House to be in recess until half past 7 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) was called to order by Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, its Clerk, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 9, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the members present may be permitted to call up bills out of their regular order on the Calendar, such bills as are in order under the special order for Friday sessions, as they may see proper.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

a private in Captain —— company of Kentucky Mounted Infantry in the war of 1812.

The Committee on Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 5, strike out "$100" and insert "$50."
In line 7, insert the word "Todd's."

Mr. CONGER. I would like to hear the report read in this case.

The report (by Mr. JAMES T. JONES) was read, as follows:

Cyrus Vigus served in Captain Todd's Company, First Regiment Kentucky Mounted Volunteers, in the war of 1812. He received an honorable discharge from said service on the 2d day of November, 1813. He served on the expedition to Upper Canada under the command of Governor Shelby.

The claimant is now receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month, this being a service pension paid the veterans of said war of 1812. He has been an industrious business man, of good habits and economical expenses, but after the business age of his life was passed the competency so carefully husbanded had, with some misfortunes, added to his unusual length of years, been consumed, and he now stands at nearly ninety-three years of age at that strait where charity must care for him, or the poor-house become his home, or his Government, in generous consideration, save him from such calamity by granting him a pension equal to the needs of his remaining years.

He was born on the 4th day of September, 1793, and the coming 4th of September will be his ninety-third year.

The petition filed with the bill for his relief is signed by the representative citizens of his home, Logansport, Ind.

This veteran, beginning his life in the wars for his country, has kept his patriotism, and has furnished four sons to the war with Mexico, one of whom, Captain Vigus, was the first man of Government troops to enter the conquered city of Mexico; and for the late war for the Union he furnished six sons, his entire family.

These sons are now all dead, save two, one of whom is a misfortune to his father, and the other, riddled with bullets, is a helpless cripple in the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio.

His family at home consists of his aged wife and the widow and daughter of one of his dead soldier sons.

In view of the foregoing facts it is believed a pension of $50 per month should be granted the claimant. Your committee recommend to strike out the words "one hundred," in line 5, and to substitute the word "fifty" therefor, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendments were adopted.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 10, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Waterville, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Cardonia, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John Burton and 490 others, residents of Decatur County, Indiana, praying for the passage of a bill granting pensions to all soldiers and sailors who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the war of the rebellion, and to their widows and orphans, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON. I present also the petition of C. H. Buthenbender and 10 other officers and members of the three local assemblies of Knights of Labor at Fort Wayne, Ind., praying for the speedy passage of the bill providing for the arbitration of all labor disputes.

The House bill on this subject, I understand, has been reported favorably by our Committee on Education and Labor and is now upon the Calendar. The petition will therefore, under the rules, lie upon the table.

Mr. CULLOM. There is another bill on the same subject which was referred to the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce and has not yet been reported; but probably the petition may as well lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. As the petition relates especially to the House bill I have referred to, I suggest that it lie upon the table.

I do not desire to anticipate the discussion of that measure, which will soon come before the Senate, but the startling occurrences of which we have accounts from day to day in the newspapers are turning the attention of all lovers of good order and of the prosperity of the country to the necessity of providing some method of harmonizing the interests of the working classes and of the employers of labor. Arbitration is the only method that seems to be open for the peaceful and speedy and just settlement of such disputes.

Arbitration of course must precede strikes. It implies calmness, and that is not to be found when the contest is once inaugurated and passions are aroused. I think so far as we can contribute by any Congressional legislation to securing the just settlement by arbitration of all labor troubles we shall contribute greatly to the peace and happiness of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. JACKSON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Rockwood, Tenn., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of A. H. Jones and other citizens of China, Me., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a petition of freeholders of Spokane and Whitman Counties, Washington Territory, and of Nez Perces County, Idaho, praying for the opening to settlement of the De Smet Mission Withhold, and also the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ex soldiers and sailors of the State of Oregon, praying that justice be done to the soldiers and sailors who fought in the defense of their country in the late war of the rebellion, by the passage of what is known as the Weaver bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PIKE presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 206 laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed at the United States navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the enactment of a law securing to them arrears of pay due on account of their being required subsequent to June 25, 1868, to work two hours a day for a day's work more than required by law; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1060) for the relief of C. M. Wittig, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2100) granting a pension to Sarah E. Hutchison and minor children; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NICARAGUAN CLAIMS CONVENTION.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to offer a concurrent resolution and have it printed and go over for one day.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the following resolution was passed in the Senate on March 10, 1882, and in the House of Representatives on the 16th March, 1882:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to bring to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua the necessity of arranging by a convention for final settlement of all unadjusted claims existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of Nicaragua and claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua;" and

Whereas no information has been given to Congress of any practical progress that has been made in the adjustment of the claims of the citizens of the United States against the Republic of Nicaragua:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to bring this subject to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua, with a view to securing the prompt and full satisfaction of the just claims of the citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. If there is no objection to it, I will ask that it be presently considered.

Mr. PLATT. I think it had better be printed. Its present consideration may lead to a discussion which would interfere with the Washington bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be printed and lie over for one day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under objection.

TAXATION OF RAILROAD-GRANT LANDS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday morning next, after the routine morning business, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1812) to provide for taxation of railroad-grant lands, and for other purposes.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee, or any subcommittee of its number, charged with any investigation into facts, may have power to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks consent of the Senate that the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee of its number, may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. If there be no objection that request will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. PLATT. If there is no further morning business I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of the State of Washington, and if I may be pardoned a moment I would say that the bill has been under consideration for a long time; I thought last night we were nearing a vote, and we were adjourned for want of a quorum. This is a day when Senators desire to have their time to themselves for committee work and for departmental work. I think we can dispose of the bill in a short time to-day; and, if so, I shall myself move an adjournment immediately thereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The first question in reference to that bill is upon a yea-and-nay vote on an amendment. The Senate is not full to-day, and I do not think it fair to take up the bill and force it to a vote in the present condition of the Senate. We adjourned upon a yea-and-nay vote for the want of a quorum, and that amendment will be the first thing to be voted upon in connection with the bill when it comes up. I hope the Senator will not press his motion at this particular time, because a number of Senators I know are not here who want to record their votes on the pending question.

Mr. PLATT. I have no doubt there is a quorum in the building. Of course I do not desire to have the Senate adjourn again for the want of a quorum, but I presume the vote will bring in a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. EUSTIS, in section 3, line 2, after the word "qualified," to insert the word "male;" so as to make the section read:

That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified male electors resident within said boundaries are hereby authorized, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired on questions of this character with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote on this question; I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. Had I the privilege to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] who is absent from the Senate to-day. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. MILLER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. My colleague would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. PAYNE. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Beck,	Harris,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Hearst,	Maxey,	Walthall.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EUSTIS. I gave notice that I should offer some other amendments of the same character, but that was under the belief that the amendment which has just been rejected would be carried. Inasmuch as it has been defeated by a decisive vote, it is not necessary to consume the time of the Senate by offering any further amendment to the same purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out section 7 and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That on the receipt of such certification of the votes so cast at said election showing the adoption of said constitution by the people of said State as aforesaid, and of a copy of such constitution and ordinances, the President of the United States, if said constitution and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, and thereupon the said State shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action on the part of Congress.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 7. That in case the said convention shall form a constitution and State government for the people of the Territory of Washington, the said convention as soon thereafter as may be shall cause a true and attested copy of such constitution or frame of government as shall be formed or provided to be transmitted to Congress for its approbation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment might delay the admission of Washington into the Union as a State for a few months. I am not certain that it would have that effect; but whether the adoption of the amendment would delay the admission of Washington for a few months is a very inconsiderable question compared with what I conceive to be the duty of Congress to look over and examine the constitution that will be adopted with a view to giving or withholding its approbation thereto.

I think that I have sufficiently indicated by the remarks I have made on this floor, which were made entirely in good faith, my earnest wish that Washington Territory should come into the Union. I hope that it will come in before the next Presidential election, not because of its effect upon that election, for I suppose that most likely the vote of the State of Washington would be adverse to the political views which I entertain; but I wish it to come in as speedily as a right order of procedure in this body and in the other House will justify.

I have no further observations to make than those which the Senate was indulgent enough to listen to on two former occasions when I had the honor of addressing it upon this bill, in respect of the importance of the exercise of the duty by Congress of examining and supervising the constitution which may be adopted by a State, not merely for the purpose of finding whether it is republican in form, but also whether it is republican and is conformable to the institutions of American government in all essential particulars.

The one question which was debated upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana is in itself important, but is by no means the greatest question which could arise in this matter. But the chief thing I wish to prevent is that the President of the United States shall have a right by his final decree to bring a State into the Union or to refuse it admittance. Under this bill Mr. Cleveland, if he should be a candidate for re-election, after a State constitution had been adopted, might find it entirely convenient to delay the issuing of his proclamation for twenty days, and thereby exclude the State from its right to vote in the electoral college. I have as much confidence in that gentleman as I have in any American statesman who ever occupied the White House, and I believe the grounds of confidence in him are absolutely certain, as nearly as we can have in any man whose political record has not been longer than his. But after expressing that degree of confidence in him, I can not feel justified as a member of this body in conferring upon him power by which after the people of Washington had adopted a constitution he could on any pretext or for any reason at all defer the admission of the State for twenty days, say until its power might be excluded from the electoral colleges, and until thereby he might get a majority for his re-election.

I present the question in this view for the purpose of giving to my opinions about it some degree of intensity, that is all, for who does not see that we are trusting a power to the President of the United States in this matter which is not conformable to any of his executive duties or powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States? I have had an opportunity, of which I have availed myself, to express in a broad way my view of the executive powers of the President in the great debate which has just passed upon what are called the Edmunds resolutions, and in that argument I expressed the whole breadth of what I conceive to be his executive powers. But it is not a part of the executive power of this country, nor is it a part of the executive power of Great Britain, to admit a province into the realm nor in this country to admit a State into the Union by executive proclamation.

The Queen of Great Britain, with all the broad powers that the Crown of England possesses, could not by an executive proclamation admit a province into that realm; she could not admit membership into the two houses of Parliament by a proclamation; and I fail to find the slighest indication of any authority in the President of the United States to act upon this question otherwise than under that power which is given him in connection with Congress to legislate. In fact I do not consider that it is entirely a clear proposition that that description of legislation which is expressed in an act admitting a State into the Union is of the character that requires the concurrence of the President of the United States.

It is a question that would be well worthy of consideration if a Territory, a Commonwealth, had presented a constitution here, and the Houses of Congress by a vote should declare her admitted into the Union, and the Senate should seat the Senators from that State, and the House should seat the Representatives from that State, whether after that the question could be made that the President of the United States had never signed the bill. There is a possible doubt upon that question, but it is one that looks in quite the reverse direction from the one that I am suggesting now. Most clearly I think it is impossible to deduce from any language in the Constitution or any duty or right of the executive power the authority to participate in the final act of the admission of a State into the Union otherwise than merely by signing a bill passed through Congress to become a law.

There might be some doubt whether the President by his veto could keep a State out of the Union which Congress had agreed in both Houses to admit, whose Senators had been seated here under that decree and whose Representatives had been seated in the other House. There might be some doubt, I say, whether the veto power would reach an enactment of that kind so as to destroy the right of that State to be a State of the Union and its autonomy as a political establishment of this country.

But I appeal to the Senate to decide the question deliberately and quietly, and without reference to any temporary inconvenience of the delay of a State for a few months as to its admission into the Union, whether they are willing, in the language of this bill, to say that the last act Congress shall perform in respect of the State is the passage of this measure, leaving everything else, the writing of the unwritten constitution, the unborn instrument, the ratification of it, to the people of that Territory, and its final admission into the Union to the proclamation of the President.

Suppose after the constitution had been ratified by the people a great clamor should come down to the Congress of the United States that unquestioned frauds had been perpetrated in the convention that adopted it, that bribery had run riot in that convention, and that a constitution had been pushed through that body which would give certain privileges of an extraordinary and possibly a valuable character to certain men, and that they had compassed the whole question by fraud and bribery, what should we do in a case of that kind? By the very terms of the seventh section we forbid Congress to touch this question after it leaves our hands. I have not the bill before me, and I shall be obliged to the Secretary if he will read the last clause in the seventh section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

If said constitution and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, and thereupon the said State shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action on the part of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. That forbids any further action on the part of Congress. It makes no difference what may take place in that constitutional convention, or how corrupt it may be, how it may violate every fundamental law that is laid down in this act itself, it makes no difference if one of the political parties of this country should go there and buy that convention out so as to have its action conformable exactly to the will of that political party, and these facts should be known of all men and come before the Congress of the United States, by that final clause in the bill we cut ourselves off from the power of affording any remedy at all.

Mr. President, I am not speaking of this, I know the Senate will believe, in any party sense. We have had but one hint of a party division upon this whole measure, and that was on the vote to exclude Montana from the privileges of this legislation. That seemed to be a party division and I regret that it was. It ought not to have been. I am not commenting upon that, except to show that in the views I am presenting here I really suppose I am presenting them in antagonism to the future policy of the Democratic party, but they are right in themselves and they are necessary for the preservation of the lawful authority of Congress over the act admitting a State. We cut ourselves off from all further participation in what is to be done in regard to this State, and therefore what we decree to-day admits the State of Washington into the American Union before the delegates have been elected to a convention to frame a constitution and before even a form of a constitution has been projected by any authorized persons.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, there is little, I think, which I need to say in reply to the Senator from Alabama which I did not say the other day when that Senator suggested that he would offer this amendment. I credit the Senator from Alabama with only desiring to act upon a principle in this matter. I am sure that he has no other object in introducing this amendment.

He suggested in the former discussion that he thought there might be constitutional difficulties in the way of thus admitting a State; but it will, I think, be apparent that there are no constitutional difficulties. Congress admits the State, as the Constitution provides. Congress simply empowers the President to determine whether the conditions of the enabling act have been complied with, whether the conditions which Congress prescribes for the admission of the State shall have been incorporated in the constitution of the proposed State. Now, what are those conditions?

Provided, nevertheless, That such constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil and political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. Provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Those are the really important conditions, and are, I think, the conditions that have always been insisted upon as the fundamental conditions upon which a Territory should emerge from a Territorial government and assume the functions of Statehood, and they are the only conditions which have ever been insisted upon, and which I think, under the Constitution of the United States, Congress has any right really to insist upon. Probably it has the abstract right to impose any conditions it pleases; but the long practice of Congress with reference to the admission of States has settled these as the only conditions, except the rare instances, one of which was quoted by the Senator from Louisiana the other day, where restrictions with regard to slavery and involuntary servitude were also inserted, growing out of the exigencies of those times.

Now, is there any possible impropriety in submitting to the President the question whether the constitution which has been formed by the people of the Territory complies with the act in these particulars? It is a simple thing to determine. The President can determine on inspection whether the constitution is republican in form, whether it makes a distinction in civil and political rights on account of race or color, whether it is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence, or whether it provides for perfect toleration of religious sentiment. That is all the President is called upon to do. The only duty which Congress devolves upon the President is the inspection of the constitution and the determination of whether the conditions which the enabling act insists upon are inserted in that constitution.

As I said the other day, this is not a new question. If it were, perhaps there might be more force in the proposed amendment and in the suggestions of the Senator from Alabama. But the precedent has been established. I have examined the cases of Nevada, of Nebraska, and of Colorado, and the discussions in the Senate and in the House upon the passage of the enabling acts for those States, and the final action of Congress in relation to the State of Nebraska; and the suggestion has never been made before that there was either unconstitutionality or impropriety in this method of admitting a State; and I can not conceive that any harm is to come from it.

It is said by the Senator from Alabama that the President may delay a proclamation if his interests should induce him to delay it, and that Mr. Cleveland might possibly, in the event that the State when it came in was to affect the question of his re-election, delay it until after his re-election. I have too much respect not only for Mr. Cleveland, but for any man whom the people of this country may put into that high and responsible position, the highest and most responsible in the world, to suppose that any such consideration would influence him or any President for a moment. It seems to me that there is no danger of any such action on the part of the President. Why, sir, if precisely the case which the Senator supposes should occur and the delaying of that proclamation for twenty days might possibly affect the question of the President's re-election, and he should delay it, that very circumstance would defeat his re-election. But it is useless to speculate on what would be the result upon a re-election. No President would do it; no President responsible to the people of the United States, if he were disposed to do it, would for a moment dare to assume such responsibility, and no President would be disposed to do it.

So there being, as it seems to me, no constitutional difficulty in the way, there being the established precedent—a change from former methods I will admit, but now the established precedent—and no harm having ever come from this method of admitting States into the Union, I see none of the dangers which the Senator from Alabama has suggested. I see no possible danger to come from it. It is easy to set up men of straw; it is easy to draw on the imagination and to suppose that in some remote or possible contingency something may occur; but practically there is no trouble in this way of admitting States; and the Senator's whole speech the other day—and it was a splendid plea for the admission of Washington Territory, and I thank him for it—proceeded upon an immediate necessity and an immediate right. Here Washington, after eight long years of asking and after two or three weeks of buffeting on the tempestuous sea of Senatorial business, to use a simile of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in the discussion of yesterday, seems to be somewhat near the prospect of becoming a State in the Union. Now the effect of this is not to delay it a few months, but I think the inevitable effect of the adoption of such an amendment is to delay it for three years or nearly that. Let me show why it will do so.

Here we are in April, nearly the middle of April. If this bill becomes a law it has yet to pass the House of Representatives. It can not in the natural course of business pass until late in the summer. Suppose, it having passed late in the summer, the 1st of July or even later than that, it were possible for the Territorial governor to call the constitutional convention, have delegates elected, the constitution framed, not the work of a day but the work of weeks; and suppose it were possible after that to have it ratified by the people before next December, does any Senator imagine that at the next short session an admission bill will be able to receive consideration and action when all the questions that have been suggested and discussed here in the Senate for ten days at least are to be rediscussed, and when it is to run the gauntlet of the passage of necessary appropriation bills and the pressure of all sorts of important legislation? It is too much to expect, and no

Senator would hope for it. That carries action past the next session of Congress and over into the winter succeeding that. What is to result then? Then it has again to meet all these buffetings on the tempestuous sea of legislation. And in my humble judgment, if this amendment should be adopted, it would be three years from this date before Washington or any other of these Territories—for the same amendment must be applied to each—which are seeking admission into the Union can be received. I believe it too long to delay what has been called here the bulwark of the Northwest, the admission of the States which are to constitute the bulwark of the Northwest; but that will be the inevitable result of it, so that it seems to me it is not wise and not expedient to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. GRAY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is absent from the city necessarily, and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. CHACE] is absent, paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. MANDERSON. I vote, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] having entered the Chamber.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired on this subject with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. SPOONER. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], as I stated; but there has been a transfer of the pair, and I am ready to vote.

Mr. PAYNE. My pair has been transferred, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CONGER. I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. PALMER] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST], detained by illness from the Senate, is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. TELLER. I announce now once for all on this bill that my colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BUTLER. I beg to announce again that my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. I do not remember with whom he is paired, but I desire to make that announcement.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 25; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Representing as I do in part the only State in the Union that lies contiguous to the territory of the proposed new State of Washington, it had been my intention not to permit a final vote to be taken on this bill until I had given expression to the very decided views I entertain with reference to the duty of Congress to take immediate steps to enable the people of Washington Territory to become a State in the Union of States. And if I believed that I at this time could add anything to the information bearing upon the questions involved, or the force, or perspicuity, or persuasiveness with which that information has already been presented to the Senate, I should feel, even at this late day in the discussion like detaining the Senate.

But, Mr. President, as the object of the discussion of any measure is, or in my judgment at least should be, to simply present fully and fairly and impartially to the Senate all the facts bearing upon the question, and all the principles of law and public policy to be applied to such facts; and, inasmuch as this has already been done so fully and ably, first by the very able and interesting presentation of the case by the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in charge of the bill, supplemented by the very exhaustive argument of my colleague [Mr. DOLPH], and these emphasized and enforced as they were so beautifully and ably by the very interesting, instructive, and statesmanlike speech of the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and for which, I may be permitted to say in passing, not alone the people of Washington Territory but those of the whole Pacific Northwest owe him an enduring debt of gratitude, it would seem to be a work not only of supererogation on my part at this time, but also an absolute waste of the time of the Senate to attempt to throw further light upon the questions involved.

The presentation of the case, the facts and figures and arguments to which we have all listened, it would seem to me, ought to dispel at once and forever any lingering doubt that may have heretofore existed in the mind of any Senator as to the absolute right of the people of Washington Territory to be admitted at once and without delay into the family of States.

Heretofore there have been instances in which the people of a Territory have knocked at the doors of the American Union for admission in which there have existed grave doubts, founded upon substantial facts, as to their right to come in. This, however, is clearly not the case in reference to the people of Washington Territory.

It would seem from what has been so ably and fully stated by those who have preceded me, that every condition of territory, of geographical position, of climatic attraction, of resources, of productiveness, of population, of established institutions, civil and military, secular and ecclesiastic, public and private; the existence of various municipal organizations, with all the attendant machinery of city governments; the existence of railroads and other public improvements; an established and rapidly increasing commerce; a territory bounded and penetrated by the third river on the continent, navigable with its tributaries for a distance of over 1,000 miles; with a great inland sea penetrating its territory, than which none more beautiful, picturesque, or grand in its surroundings, has ever been beheld by mortal man, and whose placid waters are thronged with ships from every sea—all these conditions, even were they all necessary to Statehood, and they are not, and every other requisite entitling the people of Washington Territory to admission as a State, have been more than met in this particular case.

Mr. President, I have had the honor of living for over a quarter of a century in full view of the Territory of Washington with its grand, snow-capped mountains, its magnificent forests, the finest in the world, its grand rivers, its fertile valleys and plains. I have traveled over it from time to time, and traversed its territory during all these years at various times, and on different occasions. I have attended her courts and mingled with the brave and generous people of that Territory, and I take pleasure in saying that no more worthy, enterprising, and law-abiding people can be found anywhere in all this broad land than the constituency of that Territory. She is Oregon's nearest neighbor; she is our friend and ally, and Oregon is hers; her interests are ours, our welfare is hers; together we have laid the foundations of empire deep, and broad, and eternal, and together we are building a mighty structure of commercial and political power, and of a sturdy advanced civilization, which at no distant day, if not now, will command the respect and admiration of the world.

In view, Mr. President, of these facts, briefly sketched, I should be recreant to duty, I should be false to my own convictions of propriety and right, were I to remain wholly silent when the people of that Territory, with modest mien, but yet with full consciousness of the justice of their demand, are knocking at the doors of the American Union for admission.

Mr. President, on the day before yesterday, I think it was, I cast, most reluctantly, most regretfully, and with a decided mental protest, a vote against the amendment proposed to this bill by the honorable Senator from Indiana on the opposite side of the Chamber [Mr. VOORHEES]. I refer to the amendment by which it was proposed to attach Montana to this bill and to provide for the admission of Montana by giving it a similar enabling act to that proposed for the people of the Territory of Washington in the pending bill. I did not vote against that amendment for party reason, because as I view this case it is not a party question; it never can be a party question; it never was a party question; it never ought to be a party question; and it was not upon that ground I voted against the amendment of the honorable Senator from Indiana providing for the admission of Montana Territory.

Neither did I vote against the amendment because of any opposition I have to the admission of Montana as a State in the Union. On the contrary, I am in favor of the admission of Montana as a State. I have taken the trouble individually and for myself to investigate the conditions attaching to that Territory, and the facts relative to its political and material status and general development, and I am fully convinced, so far as I am concerned personally, that the people of Montana are to-day by right and justice entitled to admission as a State in the Union.

Why, then, it may be inquired, did I vote against the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Indiana? For this reason and this alone: from the simple fact that the question as to the propriety of the admission of Montana as a State in the Union was, at the time that vote was cast, sub judice in the Committee on Territories, the legitimate organ of this body—the organ not of any particular party of this body but of the Senate, whose business it is to speak on so important a question as this before we shall proceed to take order in the Senate in reference to it. I regret individually that the Committee on Territories have not been able to see their way clear up to the present time to report in favor of the admission of Montana as a State. I sincerely trust they may see their way clear to do so within a very short time, and then I hope for one I shall have the privilege of casting my vote in favor of the admission of Montana as a State at the present session of Congress.

I am in favor, as far as I am concerned, of the admission of Dakota, Montana, and Washington. I believe each and all of them should be admitted to all the rights and privileges and subjected to all the responsibilities of Statehood, irrespective of any question of politics, because, as I said before, this is not a party question, but one that rises above party and should be decided upon other principles than those of mere partisan politics.

Then, Mr. President, without detaining the Senate, promising in the first place that I would not detain it, may I not be permitted to express the hope that when we come to the final vote on the pending question the spirit of partisan politics may hide its obtrusive head, and that the Senate may rise to the purer and more exalted plane of true statesmanship, and take order in the premises that the people of the Territory of Washington shall, without further delay, be admitted to their proper and appropriate place in the starry sisterhood of States?

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand there is a provision in the bill to pay the new State 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands of the United States therein. I think it eminently proper that there should be deducted from that 5 per cent. the moneys which the Government of the United States may have to pay for suppressing the riots that have taken place in that Territory. It is not very clear but what it may have to indemnify the subjects of the Chinese Government for the injuries to their persons and property resulting from the riots at Seattle and other points in that Territory; and it is eminently proper that the Government of the United States to the extent of that loss should at least deduct it from the 5 per cent. proposed to be given to the new State on the sales of the public lands there.

I had thought of offering an amendment requiring before the proclamation of the President shall be issued that he shall be satisfied that the Territory has paid to the Federal Treasury the full amount which the Government of the United States may have paid or for which it may be liable on account of the wrongs and injuries done to subjects of the Chinese Government. If we pay to the new State 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands within the Territory, I think we ought to have an amendment that any damages which the Government of the United States is compelled to pay the Chinese Government by reason of the riots and injuries in that Territory to the persons and property of subjects of the Chinese Government shall be deducted from that fund. I have not had time to prepare such an amendment, but it strikes me we ought to delay this matter until some such provision as that shall be considered at least.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it right to say that, according to the information that the Committee on Foreign Relations has and the public has, the Territorial authorities of Washington Territory exercised full and faithful diligence to repress these disturbances and wrongs, such as may happen in any State or anywhere else sometimes. Sometimes a great popular commotion and discontent proceeds rapidly. It would seem to be rather abnormal and rather unjust to take out of the treasury of this incoming State any part of its school fund or any part of this 5 per cent. on the sales of public lands which in all former instances we have given to a new State to help her on in her affairs, on account of the fact that in some one of the small sections of the Territory, very small in this case, probably not larger than this present District of Columbia, misguided and misconducting people, chiefly foreigners and not citizens of the United States, have assailed other foreigners who are entitled to the protection of this Government.

It seems to me that would be hard and unjust. I hope the Senator from Delaware, therefore, will see his way clear to let this bill go on and leave this Territory like all her sisters and all her sister States in similar cases to take her 5 per cent., because it seems to be clear upon all the information we now have that the authorities and the people of that Territory taken as a whole have no responsibility or blame about these occurrences. They were sudden; they were wicked; but they were not the acts of the people of the Territory. They were chiefly, as I said before, the acts of foreigners, and so far as they were the acts of citizens of the United States residing within the Territory they neither represented the feeling nor the sentiment of justice and of good order and law that pervades the whole body of that respectable community. It was an outburst. I am, of course, in favor of having the people who committed it punished, and of having the United States so far as is proper according to the same thing that we should claim of another country where a similar thing might have happened to citizens of the United States, making the proper indemnity when it can be properly ascertained. But to saddle the people of that Territory out of their school fund or any other fund with whatever it may be proper to do in respect of China and her subjects, seems to me to be quite out of place.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to press an amendment of that kind against the judgment of the Senate; but it seems to me that we ought not, while we are admitting a State into the Union, to take a State into the Union when we have the power to require that State to respond in damages for injuries for which the Government of the United States may be liable, without requiring it to make them good to the Government. I have as high an appreciation of the people of Washington Territory as the Senator or anybody else. I had the pleasure of a visit there in 1877 and met many intelligent and worthy people. The fact is that I found there was a very great degree of intelligence, energy, and enterprise that had gone there and settled the country, and a very large proportion of the people are not only intelligent but very enterprising people; and if they have a bad element among them it is their duty to suppress it as much as it is the duty of any other State to do the like.

As to those persons guilty of the offenses charged being foreigners, I do not know whether they are foreigners or not; they count in the population on which the Territory bases its claim to admission into the Union as a State.

I think it is rather a bad precedent to be admitting States that have by outrages committed on other people subjected the Government of the United States to a liability to respond in damages, because I take it for granted that whenever the subjects of any other Government have been misused in any State of this Union they will call on this Government to see that they are righted. I think if we expect to have our citizens protected in other countries we are bound to answer to that call upon us.

I will not, however, press the amendment unless it seems to be the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following amendment to be added as a new section:

SEC. 28. That at the election of delegates to the constitutional convention provided for under this act the question whether there shall be female suffrage allowed in the State under its new constitution shall be submitted to the vote of the people; and the vote shall be taken by ballots deposited in two separate boxes, the qualified male voters of said Territory voting in one box, and the qualified female voters in a separate box; and the returns of this election shall be kept separate, one showing the male vote and the other showing the female vote for or against female suffrage; and if the majority of the male voters of said Territory shall be against allowing female suffrage under the constitution, the suffrage qualification of such constitution shall be limited to the male inhabitants of said Territory who are citizens of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. PLATT. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). The pair which I have announced with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] did not extend to the passage of the bill, but merely to preliminary questions. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. My colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is absent from the city to-day. He would, if present, vote "yea." He is paired, however, on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. CHACE] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. My colleague [Mr. LOGAN] is absent and paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote for this bill.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is necessarily detained. If present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. MILLER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BOWEN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If he were here, I should vote for the bill.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] was called away last evening by business which rendered it impossible for him to be here to-day. He desired me to announce that if here he would vote for the bill. I think he is paired with some one who is opposed to it.

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote against the bill and announce my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Butler,	George,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Conger,	Harrison,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Pike,
Dolph,	Jones of Arkansas,	Platt,

NAYS—13.

Berry,	Eustis,	Jackson,	Walthall.
Blackburn,	Gray,	Maxey,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,

Cameron,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.
Chace,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Colquitt,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	Logan,	Sabin,

So the bill was passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion for a moment. We have a great amount of pension business. ["Question!" "Question!"] I think the Senate might dispose of the private pension bills, special bills that are unobjected to, this morning. There will be no occasion probably, if they are unobjected, for a large number of Senators to remain unless they see fit to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is so much committee work that I must insist on the motion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Senator from Vermont to allow me to offer a bill for reference.

Several SENATORS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky to be allowed to introduce a bill?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I present a bill and ask its reference to the appropriate committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the same request.

Mr. INGALLS and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 18.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 10, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MERCANTILE MARINE, FRANCE, GERMANY, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed and referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, in relation to the mercantile marines of France, Germany, Great Britain, and Italy.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 9, 1886.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and recommending that a part of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for that bureau for the current fiscal year be applied for the permanent improvement of the building occupied by the bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed, with the exception of the accompanying plates and diagrams.

ARTILLERY SCHOOL, FORT MONROE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the commanding officer of the artillery school at Fort Monroe, and urgently recommending an appropriation to construct a fire-proof building for the use of the artillery school and of the officers of that post; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER, in accordance with the rule, laid before the House the bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railroad to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHITING, for one week, on account of important business, and to Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, until Wednesday next, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this day has been set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce authorizing the construction of bridges, the establishment of lighthouses, and bills relating to the Life-Saving Service.

KANSAS RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 7021) to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads within the State of Kansas and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7645) for the relief of the sufferers by the overflow of the rivers in Alabama, and that the same be brought before the House for present consideration.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. FORNEY. I hope the gentleman from New York will not insist on his objection.

Mr. BEACH. I object not only on account of this being a proposition to take up the bill out of its order, but also because I am opposed to this class of legislation.

FERDINAND PLOCHER.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6692) for the relief of Ferdinand Plocher, and that the same be now considered by the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I will not object if the bill does not lead to debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. If it leads to debate I will withdraw it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Ferdinand Plocher the sum of $1,339.20, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in payment of a pension-check for said amount payable to said claimant and stolen from him by some unknown person, but which amount has never been paid out by the Treasurer: Provided, That the said Plocher will file with the Secretary such bond of indemnity, in double the amount of said check, as may be deemed necessary to protect the United States against the presentation of said lost check, with proper assignment indorsed thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF THE HENNEPIN-CANAL BILL.

Mr. MURPHY. I have been requested by the Committee on Railways and Canals to ask that the bill (H. R. 5869) be set down for a hearing three weeks from to-day, Saturday, the 1st day of May. I hope unanimous consent will be given to the making of that order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to submit a resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 1, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, House bill 5869.

Mr. HATCH. What is that bill?

Mr. MURPHY. The bill relating to the construction of the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. HATCH. I object.

Mr. MURPHY. I should like to be permitted to say one word. I want to say to gentlemen on this floor that this is the first motion of the kind I have made since I have been a member of the House. I have not annoyed this House very much. My people expect that we shall at least get a hearing for this measure. That bill was reported in the early part of February and it was discussed here for two hours, and then went to the Calendar. This matter and the other matter has been set down for a hearing, and we have in the mean time no opportunity of being heard in support of this bill. All we ask is to have a fair hearing, and we insist it is our right to have it.

Mr. HATCH. If the gentleman will modify his resolution so as to provide that the bill shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in its regular order I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. COWLES. I object.

Mr. HATCH. I have no objection to the proposition, except in so far as it changes the status of the bill by bringing it into the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] objects. The resolution is not before House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to have an order made for a reprint of the report 1332, the number heretofore printed having been exhausted. It is a report relating to foreign-built ships.

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

LAND GRANTS IN KANSAS.

Mr. VAN EATON, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Public Lands on the bill (H. R. 7021) relating to the readjustment of land grants in Kansas; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, under authority heretofore granted, submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce on the bill (H. R. 6657) relating to interstate commerce; which were ordered to be printed as part 2 of Report No. 902.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that under the special order assigning the business for to-day the bills belonging to the classes indicated, unless the House shall order otherwise, will come up in the regular order in which they stand on the Calendar, there being nothing in the special order to change that.

Mr. CRISP. We have no desire to change that order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Committee on Commerce can go at its option to either Calendar, that of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or the House Calendar; but the bills on either Calendar will be taken up in their regular order.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to the Speaker and the members of the House, at the suggestion of the Committee on Commerce, that we desire to be first permitted to dispose of what are known as bridge bills; secondly, to take up light-house bills; and thirdly, bills relating to the Life-Saving Service; those being the three classes of business we can consider to-day. I ask unanimous consent that we be permitted in the first place to take up the bridge bills.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the order of business indicated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will be pursued; and the House will consider first, bills for the construction of bridges; second, those authorizing the construction of light-houses; and third, bills in relation to the Life-Saving Service.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE OVER MISSISSIPPI AT ALTON, ILL.

Mr. CRISP. The first bridge bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. 5861) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes. I ask leave to bring before the House for its consideration, in lieu of that bill, the bill (S. 60), which has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce, and which is substantially the same bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to lay aside the House bill and consider in lieu thereof the Senate bill. The Senate bill will be reported, and the Chair will then ask for objections, if any.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Central Missouri Railway Company, a corporation duly and legally incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, its assigns or successors, to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, in the State of Illinois. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the persons by whom it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That if said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, the spans thereof shall not be less than 300 feet in length in the clear, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 50 feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as a draw-bridge the draw or pivot pier shall be at or near that shore nearest the channel of the river where, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the passage through the draw at that point can be consistently maintained; if not so constructed, then the draw-pier to be in the main channel, and the opening or passage-way to be so protected that water craft can be worked through it by lines when not safe to pass otherwise; and the spans shall not be less than 200 feet in length in the clear, with two side spans of 300 feet each, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with and the bridge itself at right angles to the current of the river, and the span shall not be less than 10 feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge: Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the State of Missouri in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt this bridge from the operation of the same.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That all the rights, privileges, and immunities granted and included in an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Arrow Rock, Mo.," approved April 1, 1882, having been transferred and assigned by the Hannibal and Southwestern Railway Company to its successor, the Central Missouri Railway Company, said transfer and assignment is hereby ratified and confirmed to said Central Missouri Railway Company.

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Senate bill will be considered in lieu of the House bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words to the House, not more with reference to this bill than to others that will come after it, of the system that has prevailed in the Committee on Commerce in preparing these bills and of the efforts we have made to safely guard them, so that the House may understand that in every case the bills contain all the restrictions and reservations usual or necessary for the purpose of preserving the commercial character of the streams that the bridges are to cross.

In every case, Mr. Speaker, the bills have been referred to the War Department, and there they are referred to the Engineer Department. The engineer having charge of the particular stream sought to be bridged makes a report. That report comes to the Committee on Commerce; in nearly every instance the suggestion, of the Engineer Department have been complied with, and amendments have been made so as to conform to those suggestions. In every case the plans must be submitted to the Secretary of War before the bridge is built. In every case the approval of the Secretary of War is a condition precedent to the building of the bridge. In every case there is a provision that there shall be no obstruction to navigation. In every case changes or alterations may be made, if the necessities of the case require it, at the expense of the bridge company, and I may say that in every bridge bill reported from the committee there are provisions designed to protect the rights of the public, so that, in passing any bill on the subject of bridges reported from the Committee on Commerce, this House need have no fear that there will result any substantial obstruction to commerce.

I desired to say that, Mr. Speaker, and only that, in order that the House might understand fully the system upon which we have proceeded. I am perfectly ready to answer any questions that gentlemen may desire to ask. The main purpose I have in view in making these remarks at this time is to ask the House, if not at the beginning, then after one or two bills have been disposed of, to dispense with the reading of these bridge bills. They are quite long; they are nearly all exactly alike; there are more than twenty of them, and the mere reading will consume a great deal of time: therefore, unless there be some special reason in any particular case why some gentleman desires the bill read, I shall ask hereafter that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] whether the Committee on Commerce have taken into consideration the propriety of passing a general bill providing for the construction of bridges, similar to the bill which we have for bridging the Ohio River; and, if so, whether they have made any report upon such a proposition. When these bridge bills are introduced in the House they go to the Committee on Commerce. That committee, as I understand, refers them to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War refers them to the Chief of Engineers.

When the Chief of Engineers reports that in any given case the proposed structure will not interfere with the navigation of the stream, the Secretary of War recommends the passage of the bill, the Committee on Commerce recommends it to the House, the bill comes back to this House and is passed, sometimes without even being read, as has just been suggested should be done in these cases. Under that system, this House and the Committee on Commerce act simply in a perfunctory way. Now it seems to me that we might pass a general law delegating this power to the Secretary of War. I think it would be easy to draught in a very few words a bill which could be passed by this House, delegating this general authority to authorize the construction of bridges, and in that way we could get rid of a great deal of this special legislation.

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] will permit me, I will suggest that at a later time in the day his suggestions on that subject will be gladly heard, because there is pending a general bridge bill.

Mr. BEACH. Then it seems to me that we had better take up the general bill and pass that instead of using up time in considering these special bills. I am aware of the fact that the Committee on Commerce in the last Congress endeavored to formulate a general bill to get rid of this class of special legislation; but the trouble with that bill—and I understand that they have a similar one before the present committee—was that it was too comprehensive; it undertook to accomplish too much. Such a bill excites antagonism and can not be readily passed. But if, as I understand, the only question with which Congress has to deal in these bridge bills is simply the question of protecting the navigation of the stream to be bridged, and if we are in the habit of accepting, upon that point, the dictum of the Chief of Engineers, why not pass a general law giving him the power in all these cases to authorize the construction of a bridge wherever, in his opinion, it will not materially interfere with the ordinary navigation of the stream or other navigable water? That is all we need; and a bill of that kind can be passed here in less time than will be occupied in taking up these numerous bills of a private character which are now before us.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, when the proper time comes, we shall be glad to discuss the question of a general law with respect to the construction of bridges.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] whether any of these bills contain any provisions for an appropriation from the Treasury to aid in the construction of these proposed bridges.

Mr. CRISP. Not at all, sir. There is no appropriation in the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE DETROIT RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 1205) to provide for the construction of a bridge across the west channel of the Detroit River to connect Belle Isle Park with the mainland.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD, and that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I object to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it proposed to pass the bill without reading it at all? If so, I object.

Mr. CRISP. These bills are substantially similar in form.

Mr. BEACH. That is a very strong argument in favor of the passage of a general law.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think we ought to have anything read that we are to vote upon.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by Mr. REED, of Maine, who said: I withdraw my objection to dispensing with the reading. I understand that these bills are all in the same form.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I withdraw my demand on the statement which has been made to me that this bill is precisely the same, except the names, as the bill previously read and passed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reading of the bill will be dispensed with and it will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the municipality known as the city of Detroit, a body corporate existing by and under the laws of the State of Michigan, be, and is hereby, granted authority to erect a bridge across the Detroit River between any point on the northwestern bank of said river within the limits of said corporation aforesaid to the island in the Detroit River heretofore known as Belle Isle, and now known and designated as Belle Isle Park, the said bridge to be devoted to such general use as may be prescribed by the municipal authorities of the city of Detroit.

SEC. 2. That the bridge authorized to be erected by this act shall be so located and constructed that the channel of said Detroit River shall not be unreasonably obstructed, but that a draw or pivot span shall be located over the above-specified channel in such a manner that one or both of the openings of said draw or pivot span can be conveniently and safely reached and passed by boats pursuing the ordinary channel of the river; that one opening at least of a draw or pivot span shall be over the best and most convenient channel of the river for such classes of river traffic as shall find it convenient to use said channel.

SEC. 3. That the height at which said bridge shall be constructed above the surface of the river shall be such as may be approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That all draw or pivot spans authorized by this act shall be operated by steam or other reliable mechanical power, and shall be opened promptly upon such signals as are now prescribed by law for the passage of boats through draw or bridges, and such other and further regulations as may be prescribed in the premises.

SEC. 5. That the piers upon which said bridge is built shall be parallel with the current of the river, and so as to avoid producing cross-currents or bars dangerous to navigation; and if after construction any piers are found to produce the above-mentioned effects, the nuisance shall be abated or corrected by or at the expense of the corporation owning or operating said bridge, and when advised by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the municipal corporation authorized to erect a bridge under this act to maintain, at its own expense, from sunrise to sunset of each day throughout the season of navigation and during heavy fogs such lights on the bridge as may be required by the Light-House Board for the security of navigation.

SEC. 7. That any bridge constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, over which the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States may be transported at no higher charge than is made for transportation of said mails, troops, and munitions of war over railroads and public highways leading to said bridge; and the United States shall have the right of way for postal telegraph lines and appliances across said bridge.

SEC. 8. That before commencing work on the bridge contemplated in this act it shall be the duty of the municipal authorities of the city of Detroit to submit to the Secretary of War for his examination a design and drawing of the bridge and piers, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one-half mile above and one-half mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction of the current, and soundings showing accurately the bed of the stream, and such other and further information as the Secretary of War may require for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject.

SEC. 9. That when the Secretary of War is satisfied that the provisions of this act have been complied with in the matter of location and the submission of plans, the building of the piers may at once commence; but if it shall appear that the conditions prescribed by this act can not be complied with at the location where it is desired to construct the bridge, the Secretary of War shall, after considering all remonstrances filed against the building of said bridge, and furnishing copies of remonstrances to the board of engineers provided for in this act, detail a board of experienced engineers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army to examine the case, and may, on their recommendation, authorize and direct such modifications as appear necessary.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, appoint one or more Army engineers to supervise and personally examine the construction of said bridge; and that the proposed bridge shall only be a lawful structure when built as approved by the Secretary of War, who shall have authority, by and with the advice of the engineers detailed by him, to order such change in construction or appliances as he may deem necessary for the safety of said bridge and the convenience of navigation.

SEC. 11. That in case of any litigation from any obstruction, or alleged obstruction, to navigation created by the construction of any bridge under this act, the cause or question arising may be heard by the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 12. That the municipal laws and ordinances of the city of Detroit may be enforced on said bridge, and the care, control, and the use of the same shall be governed by ordinances of the city enacted, as though said bridge was a public street in said city.

SEC. 13. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, and to require the removal of material obstructions to navigation by the construction of any bridge under its provisions, is hereby expressly reserved, without any liability of the Government for damages on account of such alterations, amendment, or repeal, or on account of the prevention or the requiring of the removal of any such obstructions; and if any change be made in the plan of any bridge constructed under this act, during the progress of the work thereon or before the completion of said bridge, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any change in the construction or any alteration of any such bridge, and the removal of any such obstruction, that may be directed at any time by Congress or the Secretary of War, shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners of the said bridge.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce were read, as follows:

In line 1 of section 1, insert "the assent of Congress is hereby given."

In lines 5 and 6 of section 1, strike out the words "be, and is hereby, granted authority."

In line 8 of section 1, strike out "to" and insert "and."

After the word "span," in line 4 of section 2, insert "of not less than 125 feet clear opening on each side of the pivot pier."

In line 3 of section 6, strike out "sunrise" and insert "sunset," and strike out "sunset" and insert "sunrise."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 2309) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the Nashville, Jackson and Memphis Railroad Company over the Tennessee River.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the reading of this bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman demand the reading of the bill at length?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to know whether any of these bills commits the Government to any expenditure in the construction of these bridges.

Mr. CRISP. None whatever. They merely give the assent of Congress to the spanning of the streams.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe all these bills contain a provision that if any alteration of the structure should be found necessary, it shall be done by order of the Secretary of War at the expense of the bridge company.

Mr. CRISP. That is the provision in every case.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce were read, as follows:

In line 3 of section 1, insert, after the word "that," the words "the assent of Congress is hereby given to."

In lines 5 and 6 of section 1, strike out "be, and is hereby, authorized."

In lines 2 and 3 of section 3, strike out "not be less than 164 feet in length in the clear" and insert "be of such width and height above the water as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

In lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the same section, strike out "the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 34 feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location."

In lines 13 and 14 of the same section, strike out "the spans shall not be less than 160 feet in the clear" and insert "the spans shall be of such width and height above the water as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

In lines 18, 19, and 20 of the same section, strike out the words "and the spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT KEITHSBURG, ILL.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 3370) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburg, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRISP. I ask that the reading of this bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce were read, as follows:

In line 3 of section 1, strike out "it shall be lawful for" and insert "the assent of Congress is hereby given to."

In lines 8 and 9 of section 2, strike out "nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than 250 feet in length" and insert "nor shall the spans of said bridge give a clear width of water way of less than 250 feet."

In lines 13 and 14 of the same section, strike out "not less than 300 feet in width" and insert "give a clear width of water way of not less than 300 feet."

In lines 20 and 21 of the same section, strike out "and with spans of not less than 150 feet in length in the clear" and insert "and with spans giving a clear width of water way of not less than 160 feet."

In lines 23, 24, and 25 of the same section, strike out "and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than 250 feet," and insert "and the next adjoining span or spans to the draw shall give a clear width of water way of not less than 250 feet."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS WISCONSIN, CHIPPEWA, AND SAINT CROIX RIVERS.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5803) to amend an act approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin."

Mr. PRICE. A Senate bill, identical in form with this, has been sent to the House.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I ask that the House bill be laid aside and the Senate bill considered in its place.

There being no objection, House bill No. 5803 was laid on the table; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 1476) to amend an act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin."

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act of Congress, approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin," be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "Winona, Alma and Northern Railway Company," wherever the same occur in the said law, and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "the Chicago, Burlington and Northern Railroad Company, its successors and assigns."

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS ILLINOIS AND DES MOINES RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 3371) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Illinois River, in the State of Illinois, and the Des Moines River, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of this bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of the bill demanded?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is. I ask for the reading of the bill as it will be if the amendment of the committee be agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 6 and 7, section 1, the words "be, and it is hereby;" so it will read:

"Its successors or assigns, to construct bridges over the Illinois River," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER BAYOU BARNARD, MISSISSIPPI.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 1336) to authorize the construction of a bridge over Bayou Barnard, in the State of Mississippi, reported with an amendment.

The amendment proposed by the committee was read, as follows:

Insert at the end of section 1 the words:

"And provided further, That before any bridge shall be built under this act the plans therefor and the location thereof shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War."

So it will read:

"So that at all times the same may be opened for the passage of passing boats without unnecessary delay: And provided further, That before any bridge shall be built under this act the plans therefor and the location thereof shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GAINESVILLE AND CHICKASAW BRIDGE, BROWN'S FERRY, TEXAS.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5786) granting to the Gainesville and Chickasaw Bridge Company the consent of the United States to construct and maintain a bridge over Red River, at or near Brown's Ferry, in Cook County, Texas, with amendments, as follows:

In section 3, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That any bridge built under this act shall be provided with a draw-span, affording not less than 70 feet of clear water way, which shall be by said company, without unnecessary delay, opened for the passage of passing boats.

So it will read:

Provided further, That any bridge built under this act shall be provided with a draw-span, affording not less than 70 feet of clear water way, which shall be by said company, without unnecessary delay, opened for the passage of passing boats.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I want the amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce laid on the table, and in lieu thereof I have an amendment to submit.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the committee can not be laid upon the table, but they can be rejected, if that be the desire of the House.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask, then, that the amendments of the committee be rejected; and in lieu of those amendments I will, at the proper time, move a provision necessary to perfect the bill. The committee have stricken out the words "That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time" and in lieu thereof inserted the following: "That any bridge built under this act shall be provided with a draw-span, affording not less than 70 feet of clear water way, which shall be by said company, without unnecessary delay, opened for the passage of passing boats."

When this bill was reported by the Committee on Commerce they acted on the report of the engineer in charge of the stream proposed to be bridged. The committee, thinking that Shawneetown was in the region of this proposed bridge, recommended the amendments which I have indicated, providing there shall be a draw-bridge at that place. Since that time, however, we have ascertained, and we have testimony, if it be desired to be read, that the town of Shawneetown is 75 miles below where this proposed structure is to be located.

The chairman of the Committee on Commerce, as well as myself and every one acquainted with that region, knows there has not been a steamboat within 75 or 100 miles of this proposed bridge within the last twenty or thirty years. I have affidavits of gentlemen residing on that stream where the bridge is to be built, swearing to the fact that no steamboat has been seen in that country for a great many years. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce is well acquainted with that country as well as myself, and we know it will not interfere with the navigation if an ordinary bridge is built there. The amendment I propose provides that plans and specifications shall be submitted to the Secretary of War; and if it shall be found the bridge obstructs navigation in any way or manner he shall have the improvement made at the expense of the company. All the other restrictions of the other bills are introduced into this. I hope the amendment, therefore, of the committee recommending a 70-foot draw-bridge will not be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. In concurring with my colleague about that, I will say there never was a steamboat as high up as this but once, and that was thirty-eight years ago, and that boat never got out. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks the House, as the Chair understands it, to reject that part of the amendment which prescribes the width of the span?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And not that portion of the amendment reserving the right of Congress to alter or repeal the act?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir; that is contained in the previous portion of the bill, if this amendment of the committee shall be rejected.

The SPEAKER. So that if the entire amendment of the committee shall be rejected the bill will stand with the reservation in it?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, because that which is proposed to be stricken out is inserted in another place.

Mr. HITT. Does the chairman of the committee accept the amendment of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CRISP. I do accept it as far as I can. This draw was put in, as stated by the gentleman from Texas, on the recommendation of the Engineer Department made some months ago, but subsequently these gentlemen from Texas who are acquainted with the location have ascertained that that recommendation was made under a misapprehension of the facts. It seems that there are two towns of this name on the river, and where they propose to build this bridge with the 70-foot draw there has not been a vessel, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has said, for many years past.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the committee.

The committee amendments were rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the Red River Bridge Company of Texas to maintain a bridge across the Red River; with amendments of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If the reading of the bill is not called for, it will be considered as waived by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRISP. I will state, with the consent of the House, that there is a bridge upon the same river a few miles higher up, and the same amendment is also proposed in this bill that was rejected in the former bill on the statement of the gentleman from Texas. It is desired by the gentleman from Texas to have the same amendment rejected here; and on the statement which has been made to the committee we think the amendment should be rejected.

The amendments recommended by the committee were rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COOSA RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 3853) to authorize the Talladega and Coosa Valley Railroad Company of Alabama to erect a bridge across the Coosa River.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent also to dispense with the reading of this bill. It is the same in form practically as the others.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Commerce were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SAINT CROIX RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 2993) to authorize the Chicago, Freeport and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Saint Croix River (or lake) at any accessible point between Prescott, Wis., and Taylor's Falls, Minn.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of this bill be dispensed with, being a bill of the same character as the others which have been read.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill so amended would read:

A bill to authorize the Chicago, Freeport and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Saint Croix River (or lake) at any accessible point between Prescott, Wis., and Stillwater, Minn.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, WINONA, MINN.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5673) to authorize the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from Winona, Minn., to the opposite shore in Wisconsin.

Mr. CRISP. I ask also to dispense with the reading of this bill.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the amendments of the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of section 2 insert:

"That after the said bridge is constructed as a wagon-bridge, the said company may charge such reasonable rates of toll for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, and for the transportation of animals and foot passengers thereon, as may from time to time be approved by the Secretary of War.

"SEC. 4. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to ask again whether the right is reserved to alter or amend or repeal in all of these bills?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. It is in every one of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought it was placed in this bill by way of an amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. No. This is to allow the company to construct a wagon-bridge in conjunction with the railroad bridge.

Mr. HOLMAN. But as to the condition in reference to the transportation of mails, is that embraced in all of these bills?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Yes, sir; and I will further state to the gentleman that provision is made that rates of freight and travel over the bridge shall not be charged at a higher rate than is charged upon other portions of the road.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision then applies not only to the mails but to all traffic on these bridges?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Yes; that is, with reference to all of the bills which I have reported. I do not know as to the others.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a very important provision as to the mails, and should be carefully included in all of these bills.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. In regard to the mails that provision is incorporated in each of the bills.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PONTON BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore, in the State of Wisconsin; reported by Mr. BYNUM.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have no desire to call for the reading of these bills; but it does seem to me a remarkable proceeding that we should be called upon to vote on them without a single word of explanation as to who is to build the bridge or whether the building of the bridge is a matter of importance or not. I make this remark at this time because the form of this bill seems to vary a little from the usual form. I do not ask for the reading of it, but I ask that some member of the committee shall give a brief explanation as each bill comes up. I notice this is a bridge across the Mississippi not very far from where we have authorized another bridge to be built. I notice also it is a ponton railway and wagon bridge. I should like some brief explanation of it.

Mr. BYNUM. This bill authorizes the Red Wing Ponton Bridge Company to construct a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River at Red Wing, Minn. The plans and requirements are in accordance with those for the bridge at Prairie Du Chien, 200 miles below. The bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce at the last session of Congress and failed to pass.

Mr. STRAIT. The bill failed to pass because it was not reached on the Calendar at the last session. I think there can be no objection to the bill. It is recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BYNUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE NEAR KANSAS CITY.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7626) to grant to the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line Railway Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses; reported by Mr. CRISP.

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of this bill demanded?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to hear that bill read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but before he had proceeded far in the reading Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, withdrew his request.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that that bill does more than authorize the construction of the bridge; it seems to be in part a railroad bill, and I would like to have the remainder of it read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. Before the reading was completed,

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to have the remainder of the bill read; but it seems to me to authorize not only the bridging of streams, but the construction of railway track and tramway outside and beyond the bridge or bridges.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from New Jersey must certainly be mistaken.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Perhaps I am. I did not hear the reading very distinctly, because there was so much conversation around me, but as I caught the words as they fell from the Clerk's lips the bill certainly did seem to authorize the construction of railway track.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the language of the bill at the close of the provision to which he referred. I read it: "Said railway company may construct and extend its line from its present terminus at Cedar Point, in said State of Alabama, across Grant Pass and the shoal waters intervening, to Dauphin's Island, in the Gulf of Mexico, and for such purposes may construct, operate, and maintain such tramways, tracks, road-beds, bridges, and terminal facilities at and between said Dauphin's Island and Cedar Point as are necessary for use of said railway in the common course and conduct of its business."

It is only at that point that anything like the laying of the track is contemplated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill authorizes the laying of railroad track on solid ground. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are doing more in this bill than simply authorizing the construction of a bridge over navigable waters.

Mr. MARTIN. There is no solid ground there at all, as I understand it. The road is constructed by means of trestle-work over land that is covered with water.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but not navigable water.

Mr. MARTIN. No.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why not confine the right given by Congress simply to the bridging of navigable waters and there stop? It seems to me that if we pass this bill we do more than that. I have no special objection to this particular bill; but it strikes me that by such legislation we are trenching very closely upon the limit of the constitutional power of Congress.

Mr. DUNHAM. It is simply proposing to build across a swamp.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, they get that right from the State charter.

Mr. CRISP. I call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] to the fact that we merely give the assent of Congress, and that we do not trench at all on the right of the State.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] whether the word which he uses is in the first section of this bill?

Mr. CRISP. An "authorization" by Congress in such cases simply gives the assent of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But is this bill so worded?

Mr. CRISP. I can not say without referring to the bill itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will ask the Clerk to read the portion of the first section which authorizes the construction of these bridges.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Gulf and Chicago Air Line Railway Company, a corporation duly organized and legally incorporated under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successor or legal representative, may erect bridges over the Tombigbee River at such point in vicinity of Chickasaw Bluffs or Port Jackson——

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is sufficient. The answer of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] does not seem to be borne out by the language of the first section of the bill which the Clerk has just read.

Mr. CRISP. Perhaps I did not make my meaning quite clear. My point is that when Congress "authorizes" in such a case it only gives the assent of Congress. In other words, Congress has no authority to authorize the construction of a bridge except over navigable streams.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman merely announces a general proposition, I agree with him; but I wanted to know how the matter was expressed in the first section of the bill, and it does seem to me as though we were giving to this company a power to do more than merely bridge navigable waters. As I have said, I have no earthly objection to the bill, but I think it ought to be in proper form.

Mr. CRISP. In order to relieve the apprehensions of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], I move to amend the bill by inserting between the word "that" and the word "the," in the third line of the first section of the bill, the words "the assent of Congress is hereby given to," and by striking out the word "may," in the sixth line, and inserting "to." I ask the Clerk to read the clause as thus proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the Gulf and Chicago Air Line Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized and legally incorporated under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successor or legal representative, to erect bridges over the Tombigbee River, &c.

The amendment of Mr. CRISP was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was according read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS YOUNG'S BAY, OREGON.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 4670) granting to the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, the right to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in said county and State.

The bill, as proposed to be amended by the committee, is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, and its court and duly authorized officers and agents, in the name of said county and under the authority of said court, are hereby authorized and empowered to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in said county and State, with such channel-spans, draws, safeguards, and auxiliary works as shall cause the bridge not unduly to obstruct or injure the navigation of the waters crossed by it; and that said channel-spans and structures shall be as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided also, That said draws shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of ships and boats, and in no case shall unnecessary delay occur; and said county shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 2. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized as a post-route; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for through passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile for their transportation over any railroad or other routes leading to said bridge, or over said stream in the vicinity; and the United States shall have the right of way for a telegraph across said bridge; the said bridge to be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation on said bay as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said county, by its proper court and duly authorized officers or agents, shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of such bridge, and a map of Young's Bay from the mouths of its navigable tributaries to the adjacent ship-channel, which map shall be on a scale of at least one to twenty thousand, and whose topography of the shores and hydrography shall reasonably represent the banks, the bottom, and steamboat channels by contours of 6 feet, and which shall be accompanied by other maps, drawn to a scale of 1 inch to 200 feet giving, within areas of one-fourth of a mile from each draw-span, an accurate representation of the bottom of the bay by contour lines 2 feet apart, determined by accurate soundings, and also showing the force and direction of the currents at each 2 feet of tidal stage, by triangulated observations on suitable floats. The maps shall also show the locations of other bridges in the vicinity, and shall give such other information as the Secretary of War may require for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject.

SEC. 3. That Congress shall have power at any time to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions to the navigation of said bay by the construction of said bridge and its accessory works; and the expense of altering said bridge or removing such obstructions shall be borne by the owner of said bridge.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7652) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company to construct, operate, and maintain a railway bridge across the Missouri River near or in the vicinity of Chamberlain, in the Territory of Dakota (reported as substitute for House bill 6683).

Mr. BYNUM. This bill is similar in form to all the other bills which have been reported, containing all the ordinary provisions and safeguards; but, in addition to these, there is a section which I desire may be read, so that the House may understand exactly what it contains. I refer to section 6. The gentleman from Wisconsin will explain its provisions.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That said railway company shall have the right within sixty days after the passage of this act to select one section of land in one body, or in two of one-half section each, on the west side of the Missouri River, in township 104 or township 105 north, range 71 or range 72; and, upon application of said railway company, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to cause said land to be surveyed and definitely located and a map and description thereof filed in the Department of the Interior at the expense of said railway company; and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve said land for said railway company, and shall issue a patent therefor to said company from the date of the extinguishment of the Indian title to said land: Provided, That the said railway company shall have paid into the Treasury of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, the sum of $5 per acre for said land: And provided further, That the money so paid shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in such a manner as shall, in his judgment, be most likely to advance the civilization of the Sioux Indians and make them self-supporting.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is, I understand, the first reading of this bill. It is a bill which, I presume, should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, though I shall not insist on that point. But I wish to inquire what reason there is for appropriating so much land for this purpose. Is so much land required simply for the purposes of this railroad?

Mr. STRAIT. The railroad corporation think they require this quantity of land. They ask to buy this section at $5 an acre, $1.25 an acre being the price for which land is being sold there now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the bill which has come from the Senate in regard to the acquisition of a portion of the Sioux reservation proposes to reduce the amount of land which the railroad company is to acquire from the Sioux Indians to the amount actually required for the purposes of the road. It is not desirable that a railroad company should be permitted to purchase land for any other purpose than simply the proper use and management of the road. It seems to me a railroad corporation should not be permitted to acquire land simply for the purpose of speculation.

Mr. STRAIT. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, will explain the clause embraced in the Senate bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that. I understood from some gentleman it was proposed to reduce the amount of land designated in the Senate bill. I may be misinformed.

Mr. PERKINS. The same subject came before our committee in the Forty-eighth Congress, and a bill was reported embracing the same quantity of land. During the present Congress the committee has considered what is known as the Dawes reservation bill, and reported in favor of embracing the same quantity of land which is provided for in this bill.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, in this connection that this road contemplates crossing the Indian reservation. Negotiations were made several years ago with the Indians for this land. They obligated themselves to pay $5 per acre for this land, as well as for the land taken for right-of-way purposes. At that time it was greater than adjacent land was worth per acre. In consultation with members of the Indian Committee it was thought if we modified the bill in this particular so as not to give the Indians so much it might be an inducement to the Indians to secure their consent to the provisions of the Sioux reservation bill. By this bill and the bill referred to our committee the railroad company is to pay $5 per acre, while the settlers are to get the land at 50 cents, which makes quite an additional advantage to the Indians. Many years ago the money was deposited in the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians, and it was thought by our committee best not to disturb it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The main inquiry I wish to make is whether it is deemed proper for the Government to sell to railroad corporations any more land than may be required for the current business and management of the road. In most States of the Union I know it is the policy not to permit such corporations to hold lands beyond what may be necessary for current business in management of the road. Here would seem to be a grant to sell to the railroad company beyond what will be required for the purposes of the road. Why is it not better to leave that whole subject with the bill which came from the Senate to the House, instead of incorporating it into the pending bill?

Mr. BYNUM. I will say, Mr. Speaker, in justice to the committee, that this bill only came before it yesterday, and, as the gentleman asked that it might be taken up for consideration to-day, this amendment was not considered by that committee, but at the gentleman's suggestion it was reported, so the House might consider it in passing the bill. I know nothing about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. STRAIT. It was the purpose to get it in this bill. The other bill is pending, but the provision here made is to secure the land necessary for the building of the bridge, as that bridge is desired for transportation to either side.

Mr. PERKINS. It is shown these terminal facilities are needed.

Mr. HOLMAN. On these occasions it is taken for granted that the Government will give consent in these cases, and it seems many gentlemen do not think it necessary to attend where questions purely or mainly of local merit are to be considered.

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman will permit me I will move to strike out that sixth section. As stated by the gentleman from Indiana, it was not considered by the committee, but reported to the House under the circumstances which he has stated. For myself I see no objection why it should not be in the bill, but under the circumstances I move to strike it out.

Mr. STRAIT. I would be glad, if gentlemen think it is too much land, it should be fixed at what is deemed necessary; but I think provision should be made here for the grant, so this road may have opportunity to select sufficient land for the building of the proposed bridge.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it will be better for us to consider this subject where it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the sixth section.

Mr. STRAIT. I call for a division, and I trust that that section will not be stricken out.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 50, noes 38.

Mr. BEACH. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. CRISP and Mr. BEACH.

Mr. CRISP. It is apparent no quorum is in the House, and I hope the point of no quorum will be withdrawn.

Mr. STRAIT. No quorum having appeared, I will not insist on the amendment, although a majority of those present are in favor of it, because to do so would prevent the transaction of further business.

So Mr. CRISP'S motion to strike out the sixth section was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER AT PIERRE, DAK.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7646) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge by the Dakota Central Railway Company across the Missouri River at Pierre, Dak.

Mr. CRISP. I ask that the reading of this bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent that those bills providing for the establishment of light-houses may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DUNHAM. These are on the House Calendar, are they not?

Mr. RANDALL. If they are, they ought not to be.

The SPEAKER. Some of them are, and the Chair thinks, upon an examination of the bills, it will be found that they are improperly there, if the point of order should be made.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LIGHT-HOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in regard to the bills reported from the Committee on Commerce, and now on the Calendars, authorizing the establishment of light-houses and the construction of light-ships, that the committee, believing that a light misplaced in any region is more detrimental to the interests of commerce than the total absence of a light, and that to multiply these lights beyond the point where actual commercial benefit demands would involve not only a waste of public money in their construction, but a continued waste in their support, have bestowed great care and attention upon the several recommendations of the Light-House Board, and have presented for the favorable consideration of the House only those which it seemed to the committee would promote the interests of commerce and navigation.

The amounts of the several bills reported by the committee aggregate the sum of $331,750. The amount appropriated last year for new works of this character was the sum of $332,602. The amount appropriated in 1883 was $563,000; the amount appropriated in 1886 was $486,000; the amount appropriated in 1881 was $524,700, and the amount in 1879 was $688,000.

This aggregate now reported by the committee of $331,750 I should say does not include a tender for the fourth light-house district and a supply steamer for the Atlantic and Gulf coast. The cost of these, added to the sum I have named, would make an aggregate something over $450,000.

But the committee which reports our money bills, as is well known, seldom recommends the appropriation of more than 50 per cent. of the amount required for new work; so I take it that not more than $225,000 would be appropriated next year or this year, if these bills should pass in time, in support of the new works proposed to be inaugurated by the committee.

The light-house system, Mr. Speaker, from a very unimportant has become a very important item, both in the expenditures and in the official patronage of the Government; and if the House will indulge me for a few moments—and I want only a few moments, because we are very anxious that all of these bills shall be considered at least by the House—I will outline its history very briefly and make a suggestion or two looking to a more economical administration of its affairs.

In 1840 there were 198 light-houses; in 1850 there were 336; in 1864 the number had been increased to 424; in 1870 to 519; in 1880 to 661, and in 1885 to 886. This estimate does not of course include the beacon-lights on the Western rivers, which amount to 1,061, nor does it include fog-signals or light-ships, the latter amounting, I believe, to 71 in number. The amount appropriated for this service, I mean the amount to pay the officials of the service, the amount necessary to supply the light-house and light-ships and the tenders, in 1820 was only $240,000; in 1840, $474,000; in 1850, $526,497; in 1860, $822,442; in 1870, $1,431,207; in 1880, $1,994,000, and in 1885, $2,035,000. The amount which it is estimated will be needed for the ensuing year is $2,141,000.

In 1842, forty-three years ago, a Representative from the State of Indiana in the House of Representatives, Mr. Profit, discussed the light-house establishment of this country, and this is the only real discussion I have been able to find in the records of Congress. At that time he complained that the lights were too numerous on our New England coast, and insisted that they were not only not beneficial to commerce, but that in many instances they were absolute interferences and obstructions. At that time there were only about two hundred light-houses in the country. Since that time, as I have shown, the number has been increased to eight hundred and eighty-six.

These, of course, are not all light-houses, but they are either light-houses, beacon-lights, or the stake-lights in the third, sixth, and eighth districts, and I want to add that some of these are comparatively inexpensive in their construction.

The light-house establishment in every government in the world except that of the United States is either a direct or an indirect charge upon commerce; Great Britain requiring the payment of a tonnage tax, France enacting what is called harbor dues, &c., while in this country our lights are free to foreign as well as to domestic vessels. And in view of this I think it behooves us to establish and maintain no more lights than the needs of commerce demand.

But I must hurry on as rapidly as possible. In 1845 the Committee on Commerce, then presided over by Hon. J. C. Clark, submitted a report, predicated upon a report which had been made by the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department, in which it is stated that there is no evidence showing that the lights are too numerous, and in which it is further demonstrated that the light-house service in this country was not only superior to but much cheaper than the light-house service of Great Britain or of France. He says that the light-boats in this country cost only $911, and they cost in England $2,268. He says the light-ships here cost $2,862, while light-ships in England cost $5,992.

In 1873 the engineer secretary of the Light-House Board, Major Elliot, was commissioned by the chairman of that board, Mr. Henry, to visit Great Britain and France for the purpose of inspecting the light-houses in those countries. On his return in 1874 he submitted the report, from which I will read a brief extract. I shall then leave this question with the House:

It will have attracted attention that, as in our service, the light-house establishments of Europe are under those departments of government which correspond to our Treasury Department; also, that there the administration on the seacoasts is much more simple and economical than our own, and that while in our service the law provides that there shall be two officers in each of our twelve light-house districts, in Great Britain and France there is but one officer for each district; that the officer whose duty it is to construct and keep the light-houses and the lenticular and other parts of the illuminating apparatus in repair and to instruct the keeper in the use of the latter is also the one to inspect the light-houses. Were the salaries of these officers the only consideration it would not be a matter of such moment, but the dual arrangement in use in our service since 1852 involves double sets of clerks, double expenditures for rent of offices, fuel, and other contingent items for the service of the districts, which require an annual outlay of many thousands of dollars, while the service can, there is no doubt, be conducted with more efficiency and economy than now by a single officer in each district.

And he says further, speaking of the French lights:

I find that the combined illuminating power of the French lights, expressed in French units of light, is 2,199, and the expense of the cost of maintenance is about $52.20 per unit per annum.

The total illuminating power of the light-houses of the United States is 2,233 units of light, and the cost of maintenance is $401.50 per unit per annum, or about eight times the corresponding cost of the French lights. In the calculations from which I have obtained these results I have not taken into account the cost of the erection of new light-houses, the repairs of existing ones, the expenses of the few light-ships of either service, nor the cost of the buoyage of the harbors.

Since that time mineral oil, which was then in universal use in France and in Great Britain, has been introduced into this country as a substitute for lard oil. I apprehend, although it is somewhat of a conjecture on my part, that this has tended largely to reduce the cost of our light-house service, for the reason that I see it costs about one-third of the amount lard oil costs. Still the fact remains that we have in the several districts the two establishments of which he speaks, and I propose, when a suitable occasion presents itself, to submit a resolution calling for information that will enable us if necessary to organize the light-house system, and certainly to dispense with the light-houses which are of no practical utility and those which positively obstruct commerce. That there are lights, many of them useless, that can be dispensed with without detriment to commerce, I have no doubt. I do not charge this construction to the Light-House Board. On the contrary, many of them have been established without the recommendation of the board.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me say I have not meant to indulge in any unfriendly criticism of the light-house establishment or its management. But as the old King of France and Navarre said when his privateers had arrested and carried into his presence the workmen from the Eddystone light-house, that grand old tower that stands to-day, after having battled through the centuries with the waves and storms of the sea, "I am at war with England, but not with mankind." So I say I am at war with the vicious elements of this system, and not with the grand establishment that has rendered such efficient service to humanity and to commerce. [Applause.]

LIGHT-HOUSE AT SAN LUIS OBISPO, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). The first bill on the House Calendar relating to light-houses is the bill (H. R. 5862) providing for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal at San Luis Obispo, California.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established a light-house and fog-signal, together or on separate sites, as may be found most advantageous, at or near San Luis Obispo, at the entrance to Port Harford, San Luis Obispo Bay, California.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the whole of the bill been read? It proposes the erection of a light-house, but makes no limitation as to cost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Clerk has read the entire bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Committee on Commerce do not propose to have anything to do with appropriations. They only propose the construction, and then it has been the practice for the House Committee on Appropriations to fix the amount of money.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason I have directed attention to that is that I think the time has come when the law itself should place a limitation upon the cost of these light-houses. The Committee on Appropriations heretofore have been enabled by reason of reports from the light-house establishment to direct to some degree at least and to limit and restrict in some measure the ultimate cost in each of these cases. I have listened with great attention to the statements made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. CLARDY], and I submit to him and to the Committee on Commerce the propriety of having some sort of an estimate in each case as to the ultimate cost.

The gentleman in his statement alluded to the appropriations of last year and of other years in connection with the establishment of light-houses, and stated that the amount appropriated last year was about $332,000. So it was; but it was not all for the establishment of new light-houses. It was in part to complete various light-houses already in course of construction, and a part of the money was used in other ways. Unless we mean to enter upon an unlimited expenditure to be controlled only by the Light-House Board, we ought to put some limitation in the acts themselves that will guide the Committee on Appropriations in their recommendations and subsequently the action of Congress in providing means to execute these laws.

Under the new rules, the Committee on Appropriations have not the power to do anything in that direction. They can not impose in the appropriation bill any restriction. The consequence will be that the Light-House Board can pursue their own course, controlled only by their own judgment, without this House or Congress having any knowledge of what is proposed or what the ultimate cost is to be. It is true, according to my information and belief, that the United States is better lighted than any other commercial nation, and our lights are entirely free to every navigator. But I beg of the gentleman having charge of this matter to present to the House in this case some estimate of the ultimate cost of this light-house, and I ask him to give us the information upon which the Committee on Commerce make these recommendations. Otherwise we shall be acting in the dark, without having power in any committee to limit the appropriations.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I do not care about getting into a controversy with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] as to the statement I made in regard to the appropriation last year.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, that is immaterial.

Mr. CLARDY. But the special appropriations of last year were, as I said, three hundred and thirty-two thousand and odd dollars, and I have given the special appropriation for new work provided for by the bills reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], we avoided fixing the amount of cost of any of these light-houses or light-ships, for the reason that we did not propose to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. You do not.

Mr. CLARDY. We propose simply to authorize the establishment of light-houses or the construction of light-ships, the cost to be determined by the committee that reports the money to build or construct them.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But my friend will remember that under the amended rules a proviso limiting the amount to be expended in any given case can not be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. We can not put such a proviso in an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, so far as the rules are concerned, I beg to say that, while we are pursuing a different course, the rule in the regard referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has not in fact been changed, and the Committee on Appropriations has, in that particular, just the same right now that it had before the adoption of the new rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The object of every gentleman here is, of course, to proceed in the manner which will give us the best laws upon these subjects. What I would suggest is that if the Committee on Appropriations makes an appropriation of what it regards as half enough to complete the work of building a light-house or establishing a light-ship, the officers in charge of the work may go on and expend the whole of that money on a foundation, planning the work upon a scale five times as great as was intended either by the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Appropriations. In other words, there is no power in the Appropriations Committee to say that, for any given purpose, there shall be only a certain amount expended. They may say, "This is all we will expend now;" but they have no power to limit the plan or method upon which the work shall proceed.

Mr. CLARDY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will make a proposition in order to obviate these objections. The report shows the amount that will be needed to complete this light-house. Now, I propose to introduce a proviso that the cost shall not exceed that sum, whatever it may be.

Mr. REAGAN. That sum is $50,000.

Mr. CLARDY. Then I will say "not to exceed $50,000."

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] said he did not want any controversy about the object for which the appropriation was made last year. Neither do I, except such controversy as develops the facts. I know that $332,000 was appropriated, but as I have said it was not for the establishment of new light-houses. There was an item of $5,000 for the Hunting Island light-ship, to protect a light already constructed. There was also an item of $40,000 for the Mosquito Inlet light-house; and I see that $50,000 is asked this year for the same purpose. I think my remark was fully justified.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows very well that the committee never recommends an appropriation of the entire amount for any new work, unless it is a very small one; and it is reasonable to infer that the total amount covered by these bills for new work will be less than the amount appropriated last year.

Mr. RANDALL. I admit that the work upon these new light-houses can only proceed at certain seasons of the year, and therefore the Light-House Board can not always expend to advantage in a single year the entire amount of money necessary for the construction of a light-house.

Mr. CLARDY. I hope the gentleman will state whether the amendment which I propose is satisfactory.

Mr. RANDALL. It is. Mr. Speaker, I did not rise to criticise in any way the rule, but only to show its effect as now changed. I do not say that the effect is injurious. I rather say that it will compel committees of this House that have in charge the initiation of bills providing for public works to insert in all of these bills a limitation; because no restrictive clause will ever be secured afterward, and the ex-expenditure may run on to an unlimited extent.

The Committee on Appropriations has this year, as heretofore, asked the light-house establishment to classify the work called for upon light-houses as either desirable, necessary, or indispensable. Wherever the Light-House Board has stated that the expenditure estimated for was indispensable, the committee has almost uniformly reported an appropriation for such expenditure. Wherever a certain work has been reported by the board as necessary (which is the second classification), the committee has given the matter full consideration. Wherever the work was declared merely desirable, then if we were seeking to avoid too large an increase of appropriations we have omitted the appropriation asked for. While I do not wish to throw the least obstruction in the way of the recommendations of the Committee on Commerce, I will say, that in the paper which has come to us, signed by the Vice-Admiral, who is in charge of the light-house establishment, this light-house is placed in the third class, as being merely "desirable."

Having made this statement, and recognizing the willingness of the gentleman from Missouri and the committee that the amendment suggested be incorporated in the bill, I do not raise any further objection to the measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear the language of the amendment. The limitation ought to include the survey and the necessary land for the construction of the light-house.

The amendment of Mr. CLARDY was read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "California," insert "at a cost not to exceed $50,000."

Mr. RANDALL. It should say "entire cost."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask my colleague on the Committee on Commerce [Mr. CLARDY] whether he has any information from the Light-House Board as to what the cost of this work will be.

Mr. RANDALL. It is in the estimates.

Mr. CLARDY. The estimate is that it will cost $50,000.

Mr. RANDALL. We are proceeding with full light.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope so. We want all the light we can get—on the rivers and everywhere else. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that, thanks to the industry and energy of the gentleman himself, there is not anywhere a river so well lighted as the Delaware River.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to see all the rivers of the country where there is commerce just as well lighted as the Delaware River and the Delaware Bay. What has been done in this respect reflects much credit on the Light-House Board. I am not in favor of too narrow a restriction of expenditure in cases of this kind. A light-house, if it is to be built in the deep channel of a river or bay, can not be a very extensive work if it is to cost only $50,000 for the foundation and the superstructure. Hence my question addressed to my colleague on the committee as to whether the Light-House Board proposed to restrict the expenditure for this light-house to $50,000.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no commercial country in the world where the navigable waters are so well lighted as ours.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I recognize that fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "California" insert the following: "The entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $50,000."

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the bill originally introduced in this House provided for the limitation of $50,000, which this amendment proposes to incorporate in the bill. This limitation was based upon the report of the Light-House Board and upon representations from other quarters as to the cost of the work. I ask that the report on this subject be read.

The report (by Mr. MORROW) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3228) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal at San Luis Obispo, Cal., beg leave to report:

That under the rules of the House the duty of this committee is limited to an inquiry as to the necessity for the establishment of light-houses, and does not extend to the matter of recommending appropriations therefor. The committee have inquired into the necessity for the light-house provided for in the bill, and find that the dangers of navigation and the demands of commerce on the Pacific coast fully justify its establishment. A substitute for the bill is therefore submitted (omitting the appropriation), which the committee recommend for passage.

This recommendation is founded in part upon the views of the Light-House Board, as set forth in the accompanying letters, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, January 22, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter, dated January 19, 1886, from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, transmitting quite a number of bills for the views of the board, and among them House bill 3228 making an appropriation for establishing a light-house and fog-signal at San Luis Obispo, Cal.

In reply the board begs leave to state that the necessity for a light-house and fog-signal at this point has been pressed upon Congress from time to time. At the last session of Congress a bill was passed by the House of Representatives for the appropriation of $20,000 to establish and maintain a fog-signal at San Luis Obispo, but it failed to pass the Senate.

In its annual report for 1885, on page 83, the reasons why a light and fog-signal should be established at this locality are fully stated, and it is recommended that an appropriation of $50,000 for this purpose be made, and an item for that sum is included in the board's estimate for the coming year.

An extract from that report on this subject is herewith transmitted.

A copy of the letter of the Committee on Commerce is inclosed, together with the bill (No. 3228) in question.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, U. S. N., Chairman.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

[Extract from annual report of Light-House Board, June 30, 1885.]

San Luis Obispo, at the entrance of Port Harford, San Luis Obispo Bay, California.—San Luis Head, or Whaler Rock, in this bay, is midway between the light at Point Conception and that at Piedras Blancas, a distance of 94 unlighted miles. A light at this point will be primary coast light, and will have the additional value of being a guide to Port Harford. The bay of San Luis Obispo is the most important roadstead on the Pacific coast south of San Francisco, and with one exception is also the best. The harbor is always good for eight or nine months in the year, and during the remaining time it is never actually bad. Its security is exceptional for an open roadstead. The commerce of Port Harford is now considerable, and it is increasing yearly. It is the terminus of a railway which is the natural outlet for the agricultural products of that section, and many schooners loaded with lumber make this port. In addition, the steamers of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company all touch here, averaging one steamer a day the year around, carrying both passengers and freight, and all of the steamers go to the wharf at the head of the bay. This company maintains a private light here, on which all the sailing vessels entering this port depend, none of which belong to the company. As the bay is subject to dense fogs for the greater part of the year, this company is now contemplating the establishment and maintenance of a steam fog-signal here at their own cost.

The Light-House Establishment acquired by executive reservation a small island about 500 feet from San Luis Head, called Whaler Island. It has obtained the refusal of 30 acres at the head, which it can purchase, together with adequate water privileges, for a reasonable sum. The necessity for a light and fog-signal at this point has been pressed upon the attention of Congress from time to time, and recently with increased vigor. At the last session of Congress a bill was passed by the House of Representatives for the appropriation of $20,000 to establish and maintain a fog-signal at this point, but it failed to pass the Senate. As it now appears that a light is as much needed as a fog-signal, and that both are quite necessary to the commerce of this section, the board recommends that an appropriation of $50,000 be made for the establishment of a light and fog-signal at or near San Luis Head, with authority, if need be, to place the one on the head and the other on the adjacent island.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CLARDY, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, POINT SUR, CALIFORNIA.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5863) providing for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal station at Point Sur, California.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established at or near Point Sur, on the sea-coast of California, a light-house and fog-signal station.

Mr. CLARDY. I offer an amendment to restrict the amount to $50,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "station," in line 4, the following:
"The entire cost shall not exceed the sum of $50,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the report, so I may have time to ascertain the estimate recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The report (by Mr. MORROW) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3229) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal at Point Sur, California, beg leave to report:

That, under the rules of the House, the duty of this committee is limited to an inquiry as to the necessity for the establishment of light-houses, and does not extend to the matter of recommending appropriations therefor.

The committee has inquired into the necessity for the light-house provided for in the bill, and find that the dangers of navigation and the demands of commerce on the Pacific coast fully justify its establishment. A substitute for the bill is therefore submitted (omitting the appropriation), which the committee recommend for passage.

This recommendation is founded in part upon the views of the Light-House Board, as set forth in the accompanying letters, &c.:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, January 22, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter dated 19th January, 1886, from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, transmitting various bills, and among them House bill 3229, making an appropriation for the commencement of a light-house and fog-signal at Point Sur, California, for the board's views thereon.

In reply, the board begs leave to state that the necessity for the establishment of a light-house at Point Sur has been recognized by the board for years, as will be seen by reference to its annual reports for the years 1874, 1875, 1877, 1880, and 1881.

In its annual report for 1885, on page 82, the necessity for a light at this locality is again urged and the reasons therefor are fully stated. An extract from that report on this subject is inclosed.

It is estimated that the cost of establishing a light at Point Sur will be $100,000, and in its estimates for the coming year the board has included an item of $50,000 for the commencement of this work.

A copy of the letter of the Committee on Commerce is inclosed, together with the bill (H. R. 3229) in question.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, United States Navy, Chairman.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

[Extract from annual report of Light-House Board, June 30, 1885.]

Point Sur, seacoast of California.—This dangerous point, which is still unlighted, is made the subject of much complaint. The steamer Ventura was lost there in 1875. The board called attention to the need of establishing a light-house there in its annual reports for 1874, 1875, 1877, 1878, 1880, and 1881. The following is an extract from its report for 1874:

"Vessels leaving San Francisco for the south, having proceeded as far as Pigeon Point light, take their departure from Point Sur, about 60 miles distant, the great indentation of the Bay of Monterey intervening. Vessels to the southward bound to San Francisco having arrived at Piedras Blancas, take their departure for Point Sur, again about 60 miles distant; hence Point Sur is a most important point, and should be the site of a light-house. In considering the various points on the California coast where light-houses are still required Point Sur claims the place of greatest importance. In 1866 the Light-House Board ordered an examination of this point to be made, and the following is an extract from the report of the examining officer:

"'Point Sur is a metamorphic sandstone, and has an altitude of 363 feet (established from observations with the aneroid barometer). It covers an area of nearly 3 acres, its general shape being that of a wedge with an indented edge. The general direction of the wedge, as indicated by the compass, is east-southeast and west-northwest. The north side and top of Point Sur are covered with grass, and the sides are very steep, making the ascent very difficult. The extreme eastern and western portions of this point, or rock, are almost vertical, and the upper edge very narrow, not being more than 10 or 12 feet in width. Point Sur is situated at a distance of about half a mile from the foot of the range of hills which form the prominent feature of the coast, the intervening portion of the country being low and sandy. In very rough weather the lowland is overflowed, thus making an island of the rock. Sur River, which is about 3 miles southeast of Point Sur, contains good water during the whole year, and near its mouth is a good landing place for vessels. The only way in which supplies can be sent to Point Sur is by water, for the only road is a trail almost impassable, even for a horse.'

"The Coast Survey Directory for the Pacific Coast contains these remarks:

"'From Piedras Blancas the coast tends northwest, half west for a distance of 57 miles in an almost perfectly straight line. * * * Continuing on the same bearing, at a distance of 49 miles from Piedras Blancas, is Point Sur, sometimes called Lobos, making out nearly half a mile. As seen from the north or south, at a distance of 10 miles, Point Sur appears a high, large, round-topped island, but upon approaching it a low neck of land is seen connecting it with the main.'

"From the preceding it is apparent that the importance of this point as a light-house site is very great. It must also appear that the erection there of a light-house, with the accompanying buildings, will be an expensive operation. It will be necessary to make a detailed survey of the rock before anything definite can be known as to the cost of establishing this station. As nearly as can be estimated, with the data available, it will cost not less than $100,000."

Mr. CLARDY. Instead of $50,000 I move to make it $100,000, for I find that to be the estimate of the Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I believe I have the estimate furnished by the Department, and that is $50,000.

Mr. CLARDY. Fifty thousand dollars for this year.

Mr. RANDALL. I find the gentleman from Missouri is correct, and that the estimated total cost is $100,000.

Mr. CLARDY. I modify my amendment so it will read, "the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $100,000."

Mr. RANDALL. That includes the fog-signal?

Mr. CLARDY. Certainly.

The amendment was adopted, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON CASTLE HILL, NEWPORT, R. I.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5865) for the establishment of a light-house on Castle Hill, entrance to Newport Harbor, Rhode Island.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a light-house and fog-signal be established on Castle Hill, Rhode Island, at the entrance to Newport Harbor, under the direction of the Light-House Board: Provided, That a suitable site for the light-house can be obtained without expense to the Government, upon terms and conditions to be agreed upon by said board with the owner of the land at Castle Hill.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by limiting the amount not to exceed $10,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred House bill 1134, beg leave to submit the following report:

The site of the proposed light-house is on the east side of the entrance to Narragansett Bay and Newport Harbor, Rhode Island. The channel is narrow, and in thick weather or during fogs, which are prevalent in that locality, the approach is dangerous. The Old Colony Steamboat Company has maintained a signal at this point for several years at their own expense. An appropriation was made several years ago for a fog-signal, but as the land could not then be secured the appropriation lapsed.

The navigation interests which are concerned are very large. The steamers of the Old Colony Steamboat Company alone carry two hundred and fifty thousand passengers annually and over $100,000,000 of property, and all the coastwise commerce of the cities of Newport, Fall River, and Taunton, and other localities on the east side of Narragansett Bay and Taunton Rivers uses this channel. The need for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal is imperative. Your committee recommend the passage of a substitute for House bill No. 1134, partly because its jurisdiction is confined to the consideration of the propriety of establishing light-houses, and does not include the power to report an appropriation for their erection, and partly because the proviso in the substitute is necessary to enable the Government to secure the land, which is extremely valuable, without expense.

Mr. RANDALL. There was an appropriation heretofore made for this purpose, and why it was not expended I am unable to say. I feel it to be my duty to say I can not find it in the estimates for this year. I hope, therefore, the gentleman having charge of the matter will throw further light on it.

Mr. CLARDY. It may not be in the letter, but I think the gentleman will find it in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. RANDALL. It was not estimated for this year.

Mr. CLARDY. Yes; in a special estimate. I move, in line 9, after the word "Castle," to insert the words "the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $10,000."

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Clerk to read a communication which I send up, the latter portion of which is unfortunately missing, but it sufficiently states the facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, January 25, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated 19th January, 1886, transmitting for its views a number of bills, and among them H. R. bill 1134, to establish a light and fog-signal at Castle Hill, Rhode Island.

In reply the board begs leave to say that this matter has been repeatedly urged upon the attention of Congress at various intervals of time.

The board in its annual report for 1869, on page 25 (copy herewith), recommended that an efficient fog-signal be established at this point, and submitted an item of $18,000 in its annual estimates for this purpose.

The board on 14th January, 1885, again called the attention of the Department to the necessity for action on this subject. A copy of its letter is submitted herewith, in which it is recommended that an appropriation of $25,000 be made, as the land on which the signal will have to be located is held at a high figure.

Congress appropriated $10,000 for the establishment of this fog-signal in 1875, but it was found that the owner of the land on which it was proposed to erect a fog-signal refused to sell for this purpose. After much correspondence and several fruitless attempts to get title to a site, the board * * *

Mr. DAVIS. The members of the Light-House Board testify the necessity for this work was imperative. The only difficulty has been they have been unable to negotiate with the owner of the land, who has a valuable estate of some $300,000, and always believed a light-house would injure his property. But he has at last agreed to give the land necessary, so there will be no expense to the Government.

Mr. CLARDY'S amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-SHIP ON HOG ISLAND SHOAL.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 3664) to establish a light-ship on Hog Island Shoal, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Light-House Board is authorized and required to establish and maintain a light-ship at or near the southeast end of Hog Island Shoal, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3664) to establish a light-ship on Hog Island Shoal, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island, beg leave to report in favor of the passage of the bill.

In support of the recommendation they quote from the report of the Light-House Board for 1885, as follows:

"The Old Colony Steamboat Company maintains a small light-boat on the point of the shoal extending off to the southeast end of the island. This should be replaced by a suitable light-ship rather than by a light-house, as any permanent structure might conduce to the injury of the channel. No appropriation is needed for this purpose, as the light-ship recently withdrawn from Eel Grass Shoals on the establishment of Latimer's Reef light-house could be used at this point. But before this can be done it must be authorized by Congress."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, February 1, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated 28th of January, 1886, transmitting, for its views, a number of H. R. bills, and among them H. R. bill 3664, to establish a light-ship on Hog Island Shoal, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island.

In reply the board begs leave to say that in its annual report for 1885, page 31 (copy herewith), it is suggested that authority be given to enable it to place the light-ship recently taken from Eel Grass Shoal, Connecticut, at this point, so that the private light now maintained there, over which the board has no control, but for the efficiency of which it is held responsible by the public, may be withdrawn. No appropriation for this purpose is needed, but the necessary authority should be given.

A copy of the letter of the Committee on Commerce and H. R. bill 3664 are herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, U. S. N., Chairman.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. RANDALL. Has that bill any limitation?

Mr. CLARDY. No appropriation is required. It simply changes the location of a light-ship.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-SIGNAL, GULL ROCKS, RHODE ISLAND.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7472) for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal on one of the Gull Rocks, Newport Harbor, Rhode Island.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a light-house and fog-signal be established on one of the Gull Rocks, opposite the United States naval training school, in Upper Newport Harbor, Rhode Island.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the report read in this case.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3662) for the erection of a light-house and fog-signal on one of the Gull Rocks, Newport Harbor, beg leave to report that these rocks are near the course pursued by the great steamers of the Old Colony Steamboat Company in plying between Fall River and New York, and also by the coastwise commerce of the cities of Fall River and Tauton, the volume of which is very large. The rocks are low, and in dark nights or thick weather can not be seen. A private light is now maintained by one of the steamboat companies.

Your committee recommend the establishment of a light and fog-signal at this point.

As House bill No. 3662 provides for an appropriation which is beyond the jurisdiction of your committee, a substitute is reported establishing a light-house and fog-signal at the above-named place.

Mr. RANDALL. There seems to be no limitation of the cost.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the bill the words "the entire cost of which shall not exceed $10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIGNAL-LIGHT, NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7205) for the establishment of a light at New Bedford, Mass.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a light be established on the bridge between New Bedford and Fairhaven, Mass.

Mr. RANDALL. The limit of $200 recommended by the board does not appear to be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. CLARDY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The entire cost of which shall not exceed $200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF SITE, HELL GATE CHANNEL ELECTRIC LIGHT.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7206) authorizing the purchase of the site of the Hell Gate Channel electric light, New York.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, out of any money hereafter to be appropriated for that purpose, the leased site on which the Hell Gate (New York) Channel electric light now stands.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand aright the Government of the United States now rents for $400 per annum what by this bill it is proposed to purchase. Am I correct?

Mr. CLARDY. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I think if the gentleman will examine he will find that I am correct in that.

Mr. CLARDY. I will state that by authority of Congress the Light-House Board entered into a contract for the purchase of this site, leasing it some four years ago, I believe, and for a period of four years, with the right of purchase upon the expiration of the lease. The time, I understand, has now about expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I find that I was not mistaken. I thought I was right in my recollection of this matter. It is not desirable in my judgment, formed from the information I have received, that the Government should purchase this site for the sum of $12,000, and for which we are now paying an annual rental of $400; and I would like to hear the report. I would like to have the contract which the gentleman speaks of, requiring this purchase on the part of the Government, read. My understanding is, that it has a mere right of purchase at the expiration of the lease. The Committee on Appropriations, or rather the subcommittee, have considered this question carefully, and I know, from the light I got as one of the members of that subcommittee, that I was not able to reach the conclusion that the property ought to be bought at a cost of $12,000. If the gentleman has the contract present I would like to have it read. If not, I would suggest that we pass this over informally until such time as the papers in the case can be produced and examined, for I do not wish to obstruct the other bills. I think upon fuller information the Committee on Commerce will hardly want to buy this land for the price named.

I repeat, I do not think we are bound to do so from the information as to the contract which came to me from the Light-House Board. I am clear that it is simply a discretion with the Government as to whether it will purchase the property or not, and no agreement to do so.

Mr. LONG. That is the case.

Mr. CLARDY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct in that.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask that it be passed over for the present.

Mr. BEACH. We might as well meet this question now; and if these papers are in the possession of the House I hope they will be read.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from New York desire to expend $12,000 unless there is some necessity shown for it?

Mr. BEACH. Then let the papers be read to which you have referred.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. JOHNSON, of New York) is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3558) making an appropriation for the purchase of the site of the Hell Gate electric light, New York, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend the psssage of the accompanying substitute, which has the approval of the Light-House Board, as is shown by the extract from the annual report of said board for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, hereto appended.

[Extract from annual report of Light-House Board, June 30, 1885.]

193. Hell Gate electric light, Hallet's Point, Hell Gate Channel, New York.—At the date of the last annual report the work upon the iron tower and brick boiler-house was nearly completed. It was delayed by an accident which occurred in the early stages of the work. This electric light was inaugurated in October. The light has been maintained with but few interruptions. Its site is held under a temporary leasehold agreement, which permits the purchase of the fee of the land within certain dates and upon certain specified terms. The following recommendations, made in the board's estimates for last year as to the purchase of the site of this light, is repeated:

"If the land is not purchased at the present time it can not be obtained for less than $11,000. The land is held at present under lease, which the Light-House Board has no funds to renew."

For the purchase of this site an appropriation of $12,000 is now needed.

Mr. RANDALL. This land, as I am informed, is a waste; it is valueless to anybody except to the Government for this purpose alone.

Mr. BEACH. If it is indispensable to the Government, then we should adopt the report of the committee—purchase the site.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, then, condemn it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the proper way; let it be condemned if the Government is compelled to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that the gentleman will, as I know he will be inclined to do, pass this bill over informally until we can have other information on the subject.

Mr. BEACH. That means its defeat.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all. If it has any merits it will pass.

Mr. BEACH. If we can ever reach its consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. And if it has no merits it ought not to pass.

Mr. BEACH. It is not likely that we will be able to get it up again for consideration.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally; and I assure the gentleman from New York that I will do what I can to bring it to the attention of the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIGHT-HOUSE NEAR CROATAN, N. C.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 3581) making appropriation for the establishment of a light-house near Croatan, N. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the appropriation of $15,000 made by the act of Congress approved July 7, 1884, "for removing the Croatan light-house to a point where it will be of more value to navigators," be made available for the erection of a new light-house at the proposed point.

Mr. RANDALL. I know all about this proposition. This is a light in which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] is interested. He appeared before the Committee on Appropriations with reference to it, and satisfied the subcommittee that it was right. So far as I am concerned I fully concur with the Committee on Commerce. The bill makes available $15,000 heretofore appropriated, and allows a change in the location of the light.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANNELS LEADING TO PENSACOLA, FLA.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the House Calendar, out of its order, the bill (H. R. 7471) to provide for the establishment of additional aids to navigation to guide vessels through the channels leading to Pensacola, Fla. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON], who is interested in this bill, is ill, and desires to leave the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish range-lights near Fort McRae; to re-establish the Fort Barrancas ranges; to establish lighted beacons at or near Devil's Point, Escambia Bay; at or near the anchorage in Santa Maria de Galvaez Bay; at or near the turn of the channel; and at Bay Point, Blackwater Bay; and that a day-beacon be placed to mark the shoals between the anchorage and Blackwater Bay, Florida.

Mr. DAVIDSON. There is an amendment to be proposed.

Mr. CLARDY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Add at the end of the bill the following:

The entire cost of which shall not exceed $17,250.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICTS.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 6979) authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4670 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"The Light-House Board shall arrange the ocean, gulf, lake, and river coasts of the United States into light-house districts, not exceeding sixteen in number."

Mr. CLARDY. The Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts and the lakes are now divided into fourteen light-house districts. There is a district numbered 15, but the ninth district, having been merged into the seventh and eighth, there is no ninth district, and so there are only fourteen districts in number. This bill proposes to increase the number to sixteen. It is proposed to make a district from the mouth of the Ohio River to the mouth of the Mississippi River, a distance of perhaps 1,000 miles, dividing that district which now embraces the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers; and it is proposed to make a new district of Green Bay and Lake Michigan. The report of the Light-House Board shows that the inspectors are not able to make their annual visits to the lights in these districts. The committee, after maturely considering the question, determined there was but one method to adopt, and that was to authorize the board to create new light-house districts.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri what is the probable expenditure and what the additional number of employés involved in this bill?

Mr. CLARDY. The expenditure is estimated at $6,000 for each new district. The offices of the inspector and the Army engineer in a district have a clerical force that I think costs in the aggregate about $6,000; I mean the two offices. Of course the inspector and the engineer draw no additional salary, as they are taken from the Navy and the Army.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"That section — of the Revised Statutes prohibiting the employment in light-houses of the United States of persons more than forty-five years of age be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. SCOTT. Under the decision of the Light-House Board, which I believe is in accordance with the provision in the Revised Statutes, the law is that no light-house keeper can be over forty-five years of age. There are plenty of men competent at forty-five or fifty-five years of age to fill these positions, and they are prohibited from so filling them by the ruling under the law as it now exists.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the law is that no employé shall remain beyond forty-five years of age? Or is it that he shall not be originally employed if over forty-five?

Mr. SCOTT. It is that he shall not be originally appointed. I desire to allude to a case in point. I recommended for a vacancy a man who had served during the entire war, a Democrat. He was a sailor, in the prime of life, competent to discharge any duty that a sailor can discharge. When this recommendation was sent to the Light-House Board they declined to appoint him because he was over forty-five years of age. He was not quite fifty, and they declined to appoint him.

Mr. RANDALL. I think any discretion as to age should be wiped out. I think the amendment a proper one.

Mr. CLARDY. I submit that the law does not now interfere with the discretion of the Light-House Board in that regard. The law is silent on the question; and if the board have adopted a rule for their own government which we propose to change, we might as well know we are not changing the law when doing it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is simply a Department regulation, and that is the worst sort of legislation.

Mr. CLARDY. I have no authority from the Committee on Commerce to accept the amendment. Individually, I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment should be made to cover any law or regulation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The amendment proposes to repeal a law that does not exist.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I will accept the amendment of my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and will so modify the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any law or regulation prohibiting the employment in the light-houses of the United States of persons more than forty-five years of age be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is very unjust to exclude any one from holding any office under the Government because he is more than forty-five years of age, provided he is otherwise qualified for the service. The civil-service law has a provision of that kind; I do not know whether this is borrowed from that or not; but in any case it seems to me that the idea of the amendment is a very proper one, and that it should be made to apply to every branch of the public service.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me impossible for us by an act of Congress to repeal a regulation. As I understand the gentlemen who favor this modification, they would leave to the Light-House Board the discretion to determine at what age a man shall be allowed to enter into the light-house service; but if you pass this amendment in this form you have not only repealed the regulation, but you have provided that such a regulation shall not be hereafter adopted; in other words, you have taken away from the Light-House Board this discretion.

Mr. REAGAN. That is just what we ought to do.

Mr. LONG. At present the discretion is with the Light-House Board, and I think we had better leave it there.

Mr. RANDALL. No. The question is whether, with or without law, the Light-House Board have established a regulation which, in their action, is as effective as law, a regulation which prohibits the appointment of any one as a keeper, &c., in the light-house service who is over forty-five years of age. I submit that Congress has the power to legislate to prevent any such discriminating regulation by any department of this Government.

Mr. LONG. Of course you have the power, but do you want to take away the discretion from the board?

Mr. RANDALL. I do. They ought to test a man's qualifications mentally and physically and be governed by that in determining whether he is fit for the service or not.

Mr. WARNER. Instead of fixing an arbitrary rule as to age.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this bill creates some new districts and carries with it the creation of additional offices. I understand that, with the growing interests of commerce in this country, these additional officers are required; but what a striking commentary it is on those professions of retrenchment and economy with which the air was pregnant two years ago.

Mr. RANDALL. We can bear that.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, if the public service demands an increase I do not think it is right to say it is a violation of the principles of retrenchment and reform to provide for that increase.

Mr. RANDALL. The security of life should not be a question of economy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE TENDER, FOURTH DISTRICT.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7631) authorizing the construction of a steam light-house tender for use in the fourth light-house district.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed an iron screw-steamer for use as a light-house tender in the fourth light-house district.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill relates to the building of a light-house tender for use in the fourth district in place of the old one, which is to be taken somewhere else. I think the bill ought to be amended so as to place a limitation upon the cost. It is the opinion of those who have considered the matter that the limit can to be fixed at $68,300.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote has been taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill; but if there is no objection the amendment can be offered at this time.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend the bill by adding the words "the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $68,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE SUPPLY STEAMER—ATLANTIC AND GULF COASTS.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7627) providing for the construction of a light-house supply steamer for the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to construct a suitable steamer for use in supplying the light-houses on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, the sum required for the construction of the same to be paid from an appropriation hereafter to be made for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3483) making an appropriation for the construction of a light-house supply steamer for the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, beg leave to report that the committee are of opinion that the needs of the light-house service require such a steamer. They accordingly report a substitute for House bill No. 3483, which provides for the construction of said steamer.

An extract from the annual report of the Light-House Board for 1885 is herewith appended.

The supply steamer Fern, which delivers to the light-houses on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts all the oil and other supplies used, is fifteen years old; is too small to carry all the supplies needed, and is expensive to maintain in proportion to the work done. It is proposed to replace her with a new ship to be built for the purpose, and to use the Fern as a tender. It is therefore suggested that an appropriation of $150,000 be made to enable the board to build an iron steamer of about 1,200 tons burden. The Fern, which measures about 548 tons, was able to distribute the supplies when lard oil was used as the illuminant; but now that mineral oil is substituted for it nearly twice as many gallons are required, though at about one-third of the cost of lard oil, and hence twice the room is required to carry it. Last year the Fern delivered over 150,000 gallons of oil, in addition to an enormous mass of other supplies; still quite a quantity of light-house stores, buoys, and their moorings, which the supply-ship would have carried if she had only had sufficient capacity, had to be sent out by freight lines. Next year the board will have to distribute about 200,000 gallons of oil, and, as the Fern must give that the preference, a still larger proportion of the other supplies will be sent as freight, at a much greater expense than heretofore. It is desired in the interests of economy, as well as of celerity and certainty, that light stations should be supplied by the supply ship, so that all the wants of each station may be fully and instantly met, and that she may bring back all surplus and condemned stores to the general light-house depot on her return trip.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the words "not to exceed the sum of $147,500."

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill whether there is a general provision of law in relation to the construction of such vessels as the tender for the fourth district just provided for and the supply steamer now under consideration. It seems to me that these vessels ought to be built under some letting, which would secure to the Government the advantage of competition. The matter should not be left wholly to the discretion of the officials of the Government. I have no amendment ready to offer. I simply throw out this suggestion.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to amend by adding to the bill the following:

Provided, That the contract for the construction of such steamer shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement, and that such steamer shall be built in American ship-yards.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like by unanimous consent to have an amendment similar to this inserted in the bill just passed providing for a tender for the Delaware River. If the provision is proper in one place it is equally so in the other.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request for unanimous consent after this bill is disposed of. The next question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] to limit the cost of this supply steamer to $147,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE TENDER, FOURTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask unanimous consent that an amendment in the same form as that offered a few moments ago by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] be added to the bill (H. R. 7631) authorizing the construction of a steam light-house tender for use in the fourth light-house district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That the contract for the construction of such steamer shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement, and that such steamer shall be built in American ship-yards."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be amended by the addition of the proviso just read.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LIGHT-SHIP OFF ENTRANCE TO CHESAPEAKE BAY.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7632) to establish a light-ship off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be constructed and established a first-class light-ship, with a steam fog-signal, off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear the report.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think we should have the report read, or some explanation should be given.

The report (by Mr. CLARDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6076) providing for the establishment of a light-ship and fog-signal at the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute, which has the approval of the Light-House Board, as is shown by the communications of S. C. Rowan, vice-admiral United States Navy, and chairman of said board, to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, under dates March 20, 1886, and April 3, and which are hereto appended.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, March 20, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated March 5, 1886, transmitting for its views two House bills, one of which was bill No. 6076, appropriating $60,000 to construct and establish a first-class light-ship, with a steam fog-signal, off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

In reply, the board begs leave to say that this matter came up for consideration at its session on March 17, 1886, when the conclusion was reached that a light-ship so placed would be a valuable aid to navigation, and the board has the honor to recommend that the proper steps be taken for its establishment.

A copy of the letter of the Committee on Commerce and of H. R. bill 6076 are inclosed.

Very respectfully,

HENRY F. PICKING,
Commander, U. S. Navy, Naval Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, April 3, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to again refer to a letter from the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated March 5, 1886, transmitting for its views two House bills, one of which was bill No. 6076, appropriating $60,000 to construct and establish a first-class light-ship with a steam fog-signal off the entrance to Chesapeake Bay.

In further reply the board begs leave to say that an attempt has been made from time to time to make this entrance by lighted and whistling buoys, but without much success, as the lights have gone out and the buoys have been carried away from their positions, so that they have afforded little, if any, real aid to mariners.

The board feels that it is very important to have a light-ship at that point, as the quantity of commerce passing between Capes Henry and Charles is immense, being all the shipping that is making for Baltimore, Richmond, and Norfolk, the new harbor of Newport News, and all the tributaries to Chesapeake Bay, as well as that which seeks Hampton Roads as a harbor of refuge.

Now that Newport News has become the terminus of a great railroad system, and that new and important railroad connections have been made at Norfolk and vicinity, this commerce is much greater than ever before, and the most approved and best methods of security should be given it.

A copy of the above-mentioned letter from the Committee on Commerce and of House bill No. 6076 are herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, U. S. Navy, Chairman.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend the bill by adding "the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $60,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I offer this further amendment. At the end of the bill add the following:

Provided, That the construction of said light-ship shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement, and that said light-ship shall be built in American ship-yards.

Mr. REAGAN. Should we not provide for some supervision or some test to secure the building of a proper vessel?

Mr. DINGLEY. I presume the Secretary of the Treasury will have supervision and control in this matter. Of course the plans for this light-ship will be made under his direction, and all bids must conform to them.

The amendment of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, CRABTREE'S LEDGE, MAINE.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7628) for the establishment of a light-house on Crabtree's Ledge, in Frenchman's Bay, Maine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established and erected a light-house on Crabtree's Ledge (so called), between Bean Island and the mainland of Crabtree's Neck, in Frenchman's Bay, Hancock County, Maine.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5279) providing for the erection of a light-house on Crabtree's Ledge, in Frenchman's Bay, Maine, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute, which has the approval of the Light-House Board, as is shown by the communication of S. C. Rowan, vice-admiral, United States Navy, and chairman of said board, to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, February 1, 1886, and which is hereto appended.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives, dated February 15, 1886, transmitting for its views House bill 5279, making an appropriation of $10,000 for establishing a light-house on Crabtree's Ledge, in Frenchman's Bay, Maine.

In reply the board begs leave to say that this matter was considered at its session on March 24, 1886, when it came to the conclusion that a light and fog-signal should be established at the point named.

This ledge is situated at the entrance from Frenchman's Bay to Sullivan's Harbor, Maine, about 800 feet from Crabtree's Point on the west and one-third of a mile from Bean Island on the east, with soundings of from 6 to 8 feet upon it at low water, and since the recent construction of a branch of the Maine Central Railroad to Sullivan's Harbor has become a more serious obstruction to navigation than before from the fact that it is near the track of passenger steamers which ply between the railroad terminus and Bar Harbor, Mount Desert.

Travel over this route has of late assumed larger proportions and is increasing. In winter there are three lines of steamers running with more or less regularity, and in summer the various steamers plying in these waters make from fifteen to twenty trips daily and many of these trips are made at night.

It is therefore necessary that a light and fog-signal should be established to mark this ledge, so that vessels may pass it with confidence and safety at night and in thick weather.

The amount named in the bill is inadequate for this purpose. It is therefore respectfully recommended that an appropriation of $25,000 be made for the establishment of a light and fog-signal at Crabtree's Ledge, Frenchman's Bay, Maine.

A copy of the letter of the Committee on Commerce and of House bill No. 5279 are inclosed.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, United States Navy, Chairman.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the limitation of expense in this case?

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend the bill by adding "the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT AT WHITEHALL NARROWS, NEW YORK.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 6662) to establish a light at Whitehall Narrows, New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established above Pulpit Point, Whitehall Narrows, New York, a light to guide vessels through said narrows.

The report (by Mr. JOHNSON, of New York) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3560) to establish a light at Whitehall Narrows, New York, beg leave to submit the following report:

The site of proposed light is at a narrow point of channel in Whitehall Narrows, on Lake Champlain, New York. The Light-House Board in report for 1885 state that, at the point named, "the channel is not clearly defined, and an additional light is necessary."

The committee report a substitute for the bill (omitting appropriation), and recommend same for passage.

Mr. CLARDY. This involves only $200.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-SIGNAL, DEER ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7629) authorizing the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal at Deer Island, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish a light-house and fog-signal at or near Deer Island, in Boston Harbor, Massachusetts.

Mr. LONG. The entire cost of this work will be $35,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that heretofore we have been wofully lacking in reference to these light-houses, or else we are recklessly establishing them now. I ask, therefore, either for the reading of the report of the committee in this case, or that we shall have some explanation of the necessity for this work.

Mr. LONG. Let the report be read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Or let us have some explanation of some sort of the necessity for this work.

Mr. LONG. I will simply state then to the gentleman from Ohio, and for the information of the House, that the Light-House Board have recommended this work as one particularly desirable, putting it in the first class.

The steamers plying between Boston and the Northern ports make use of the Broad Sound channels, and a light and fog-signal at this point are particularly desirable, because of the narrow and devious passages.

That is the recommendation of the Light-House Board contained in their annual report under date of June 30, 1885. For this purpose an appropriation of $135,000 is needed. It is the only work reported for the whole coast of Massachusetts, and I hope there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It would seem that this Light-House Board is somewhat like the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and will recommend almost anything.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, LUBEC NARROWS, MAINE.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7630) for the erection of a light-house at Lubec Narrows, Maine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established a light-house at or near Lubec Narrows, Maine.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is there no report accompanying this bill, and are we to have no explanation to let us know what we are doing? We may have light enough by and by, but let us have some on this bill now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask for the reading of the report?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, I ask for the reading of the report, or for some explanation on the part of some gentleman of the necessity for this work.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the report read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. DAVIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3445) providing for the erection of a light-house at Lubec Narrows, Maine, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute, which has the approval of the Light-House Board, as is shown by the communication of S. C. Rowan, Vice-Admiral, United States Navy, and chairman of said board, to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, February 1, 1886, and which is hereto appended:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, February 1, 1886.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives, dated January 28, 1886, transmitting for its views a number of House bills, and among them a bill (H. R. 3445) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house at Lubec, Me.

In reply, the board begs leave to say that in its annual estimates for 1883 and for 1884 an item of $40,000 was included for the erection of a light-house at Lubec Narrows, and that in its report for 1883, page 8, the necessity for this light is fully stated.

In its annual report for 1885, on page 18, the reasons why a light should be established at this point are again stated, and recommendation is made that an appropriation of $40,000 be made therefor, and an item for that sum is included in the board's estimates for the coming year.

An extract from the board's report for 1885 is herewith transmitted.

A copy of the letter from the Committee on Commerce is inclosed, together with the bill (3445) in question.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral, U. S. Navy, Chairman.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

[Extract from annual report of Light-House Board, June 30, 1885.]

Lubec Narrows, Maine.—The following recommendation, made in the board's estimates for last year, is repeated:

"Since the dredged channel between Lubec and Campobello Island, on the coast of Maine, has been completed by the War Department, it has become evident that, to make this channel of value to commerce at night, a light should be established at the entrance."

For the purpose an appropriation of $40,000 is needed.

Mr. CLARDY. This improvement was strongly recommended by the Light-House Board. In addition to that, members of that board appeared before the committee and urged it as an important work.

Mr. RANDALL. I have great respect for the Light-House Board and their recommendations, but they are the least bit extravagant, and I wish to compliment the Committee on Commerce for having reduced very largely the estimates submitted by that board for this kind of work.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman will apply the expression he made a while ago, which I was glad to hear, that the matter of economy did not come in when human life was to be saved, I think he will sustain this proposition. I have been through this channel a great many times myself, and it is crooked and somewhat obstructed, but it leads to one of the finest harbors of the globe, where there is an immense amount of commerce. I have no doubt every gentleman in this House if he could be on the spot, and, as I have done, see it for himself, would approve the decision of the Light-House Board.

Mr. RANDALL. I made the remark because emphasis seemed to be given to the recommendation of the Light-House Board, and my criticism was just. Their figures and their estimates warrant the remark I made.

As to this particular light, of course the gentleman from Maine knows more about it than I, but the general remark which I made with reference to all these bills I think was only reasonable.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not understand that the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania were directed to a criticism of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would state for the information of the House that the proposition to construct this light-house does not come here as a local measure in any way. It is recommended as a measure which originated with the Light-House Board, resulting from their own observations as to the necessities of commerce on the eastern coast of the State of Maine.

The United States Government for the past six or seven years has been engaged in making an improvement of an important channel on the extreme eastern coast of the State, between the town of Lubec and the British island of Campobello, the channel forming the principal entrance to the Saint Croix River and adjacent waters. That improvement has been completed and it is open to commerce, but some additional work will yet have to be done, and the Light-House Board have recommended and urged the necessity for the erection of this light-house, so as to enable the utilization of this channel, which the Government had opened, for commerce at night.

Mr. RANDALL. Exception having been taken to my remark touching the conduct of the Light-House Board in connection with their estimates, I find on an examination that they estimated for these general purposes, such as come now in the main under the control of the Committee on Commerce, except such as are already in course of construction, for the year 1886, $1,261,000, and for this year they ask $1,346,000. The Committee on Commerce, as I have said before, I think have reduced the appropriation under the estimate to a little over $400,000. I think, therefore, I have given the figures upon which was correctly predicated my criticism.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by adding to the bill the words "the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $40,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL AIDS TO NAVIGATION—MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7633) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established additional aids to navigation oft and near the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana, as follows: A light-ship off the entrance to the jetties at the South Pass; higher and more powerful lights at or near the outer ends of the jetties at the South Pass, to replace those now in existence; a steam or hot-air fog-signal at or near the end of the east jetty; a higher and more powerful light on one of the jetties at the Head of the Passes; and a fog-signal at or near Cubit's Gap, in said Mississippi River.

Mr. COX. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. CLARDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 986) providing for the establishment of a fog-signal, light-ship, and lights off the mouth of the Mississippi River, and for other purposes, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute, which has the approval of the Light-House Board, as is shown by the communication of S. C. Rowan, Vice-Admiral United States Navy, and chairman of said board, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of date 18th February, 1886, and which is hereto appended.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, February 18, 1886.

SIR: Referring to the letter from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated January 19, 1886, and inclosing House bill 986, providing for the establishment of fog-signal, light-ship, and lights off the mouth of the Mississippi River, and for other purposes, the board has the honor to state that it has carefully considered the subject and respectfully reports that the light acting as a range with the main light in entering between the jetty ends, mentioned in section 3 of the bill, had been ordered to be built before this bill was introduced, and was lighted January 4, 1886.

The board recommends that the following additional aids to navigation be erected:

South Pass jetties.—A light of increased height and power on each jetty to replace existing lights, and a steam or hot-air fog-signal on the east jetty.

Head of the Passes.—A light of increased height and power on the east jetty.

Cubit's Gap.—A fog-bell struck by machinery, with a dwelling for the keeper.

The board does not recommend the establishment of the other aids mentioned in the bill.

For the aids recommended the board requests that Congress be asked to make an appropriation of $27,500, as shown in the following summary:

South Pass jetties:
Two lights of increased height and power shown from skeleton wooden towers, at $3,000 each, making for the two	$6,000
A steam or hot-air fog-signal on the east jetty, including a dwelling for the keeper, fog-signal house, and preparation of foundation	15,000
Head of the Passes:
One light of increased height and power shown from skeleton wooden structure	3,000
Cubit's Gap:
Fog-bell, struck by machinery, and dwelling for the keeper	3,500
Total	27,500

It is further suggested that the bill be amended so as to read as follows:

A bill for the establishment of additional aids to navigation on the Mississippi River.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the following sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the following objects:

For establishing higher and more powerful lights at or near the ends of the South Pass jetties, Mississippi River; for establishing a steam or hot-air fog-signal at or near the end of the east jetty, South Pass, Mississippi River; for establishing a higher and more powerful light on one of the jetties at the Head of the Passes, Mississippi River; for establishing a fog-signal at or near Cubit's Gap, Mississippi River, $27,500.

A copy of the letter from the Committee on Commerce previously referred to and a copy of House bill No. 986 are herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

S. C. ROWAN,
Vice-Admiral U. S. N., Chairman.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by adding:

The entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $52,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, SEUL CHOIX POINT, MICHIGAN.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 7647) to establish a light-house at Seul Choix Point, Michigan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established a light-house at or near Seul Choix Point, on the northern shore of Lake Michigan, Michigan.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by adding:

The entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TARSNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this disposes of all of the bills for the establishment of light-houses under the special order.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. IRION] has charge of the bills for the establishment of the life-saving stations, which bills are also embraced in that order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana.

ADDITIONAL LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. IRION. Mr. Speaker, there were a large number of bills presented to the committee for the establishment of additional life-saving stations, all of which were submitted to the superintendent of that department, and on consultation with him a number were stricken out, and it was deemed by the committee best to embody all of these remaining propositions in one bill, authorizing the establishment of the life-saving stations recommended as absolutely necessary by the superintendent of the service. I therefore ask that the bill be now taken up for consideration.

The bill (H. R. 6975) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to establish additional life-saving stations upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States as follows: One at or near Point Allerton, Massachusetts; one at such point between the Parmet River life-saving station and the south end of Nausett Beach, Cape Cod, Massachusetts, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend; one at or near Cape Poge, Massachusetts; one at or near Cuttyhunk, Massachusetts; one on the northwest side of Block Island, Rhode Island; one on the coast between Point Judith and Watch Hill, Rhode Island; one on Fisher's Island, Long Island Sound; one at or near Fisherman's Island, Virginia; one at or near Oak Island, North Carolina; one at or near Old Topsail Inlet, North Carolina; one at or near Plum Island, Lake Michigan; one at South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan; one at South Chicago, Ill.; one at or near Bois Blanc Island, Straits of Mackinaw; one at or near Point Adams, Oregon; one at such point between Point Reyes and Point Diablo, California, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend; one at such point between Point San José and Point Lobos, California, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

Mr. IRION. I am instructed by the committee to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, after the word "recommend," add, "one on Lake Ontario, New York, at or near the mouth of the Niagara River, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to throw any obstacle in the way of the establishment of life-saving stations which may be deemed necessary or essential for the preservation of life, but I desire to direct the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the fact that there are already authorized by law twenty life-saving stations that are not yet established or contracted for. Lest I might be mistaken in that connection I have made inquiry to-day as to how many remain uncontracted for under the acts of 1874, June, 1878, and under the act of May 4, 1882.

And Mr. Kimball, superintendent of this establishment, makes answer:

In answer to your telegram you are informed there are twenty life-saving stations authorized by law not yet constructed or under contract for construction.

Now, if this bill is intended to indicate to the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service that the Congress of the United States wants that those life-saving stations yet unprovided, but authorized by law, shall be constructed at these places, no harm will be done. But I think if this bill provides stations at sixteen places, in addition to the twenty not yet constructed, we ought to understand that fact.

Mr. CRISP. This bill is to authorize the construction of that many more, not at once, but from year to year as appropriations are made by Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. We give each year, and propose to give this year, $50,000——

Mr. CRISP. We have been giving that for several years.

Mr. RANDALL. For the construction of new life-saving stations, and that is all the superintendent has ever asked for, I believe. It is certainly all he has asked for this year.

Mr. CRISP. About ten can be constructed for $50,000, averaging $5,000 apiece.

Mr. RANDALL. I will ask to have read a part of the statement of the superintendent of the life-saving stations on this subject as throwing some light upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is the hope and expectation that during the coming fiscal year ten of the stations authorized by law may be erected. It is thought, however, that not more than six will be completed in time to be manned by crews during the active season of that year. The estimate for crews at new stations is made upon the basis of seven men in each of these stations for eight months of the year, and amounts to $16,800. The stations on the great lakes are open on an average eight and one-half months, and at certain of these stations it is necessary to employ eight men.

Mr. RANDALL. It will be observed from this statement that the superintendent of the life-saving stations only proposes during the coming fiscal year to erect ten new stations, only one-half of what he has now authority for, and that only six of them will be in such a state of completion as to be manned by crews. During the eight months of the year they are under the care of a keeper, and of the seven men that are usually employed, the keeper generally receives a salary of $700, and each of the seven men receives $50 a month for the period they are employed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Eight months.

Mr. LONG. I would suggest that I suppose it is possible one of these new stations might be regarded by the superintendent as of more importance than those previously authorized.

Mr. RANDALL. Then he has authority under existing law to construct it.

Mr. LONG. Not until we pass this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It would seem that we have all the time been in the dark if one of the stations to be built now is worth more than all that have been built heretofore.

Mr. RANDALL. I only wanted to direct the attention of the House to the fact that there is law for the erection of twenty more stations than are now constructed, and ten more than the superintendent declares to be possible for him to construct in the next fiscal year. And yet the House is asked to authorize sixteen additional stations.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the gentleman if the law in regard to the stations now authorized does not fix the particular places?

Mr. RANDALL. Not in every case. If the gentleman will come over here I will show him the provisions of law. I do not desire to take time by having them read. The provision of the law in some cases is general.

Mr. REAGAN. With reference to the suggestion that the stations provided for in this bill may be of more importance than those heretofore provided for by law, it is right to say none have been provided for except on the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, and he certainly ought not to have recommended at any time any not necessary to build.

I do not propose to discuss this subject, and have made no preparation for doing so; but I wish to say further, it will be seen by an examination of the various acts relating to the Life-Saving Service in the last few years that its growth has been very extraordinary. Its increase caused the increased number of stations. The needs of commerce might have demanded a good many of these. But this service has taken the course of all new bureaus, of being built up as rapidly as the peculiar ideas of the head of the bureau called for. We have now twenty stations authorized by law not yet constructed. I know some of them are of importance. I know that one at Galveston has been provided for several years. It has been greatly needed during that time, and is not yet built. I do not know how much longer it will be before it is built. It is right to say in that connection the superintendent told our committee he was to make arrangements to build it soon. He said that also a year ago, and he said it a year before that. I mention this to show some discretion is exercised in the selection of places where these stations are to be built.

The House ought to know there are thirty life-saving stations on the coast of New Jersey alone. I am not prepared with the statements. I desired to see a chart and tried to get it, but never obtained it, which would exhibit the number of life-saving stations and their proximity. That exhibition would have shown some of the places in this bill do not require to have stations. I remember one case of a life-saving station being provided between two others 7 miles apart in this bill. I remember generally looking over the bill, and I saw but two places named where it occurred to me additional stations were needed—one on the coast of North Carolina and one at the mouth of the Columbia River.

I feel that it is due to the House to state this much, that the service is being increased in the number of stations more rapidly than seems to be necessary. Stations have been called for which seem to me to be more for the purpose of securing appropriations for particular districts and giving employment to men at particular places than because the needs of commerce demand them. I do not propose to say anything more on this subject at this time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has stated what has been the increasing cost of this service. As chairman of the Committee on Commerce, is he prepared to state to the House the number of lives and the amount of property saved by this service?

Mr. REAGAN. I know, sir, that the service makes a very imposing exhibit of the amount of property and the number of lives it has saved and shows that it has been very efficient in that respect, and whenever it can be shown that a station is necessary to that end I am prepared to vote for it. But I do think that when the superintendent informs us that he can not establish more than ten new stations in a year, and when we have already twenty such stations provided for, a two-years' supply in advance, all of them heretofore recommended by him and passed upon his recommendation, it is time we should hold up and let him establish the stations already provided for before we extend the list.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. Can the gentleman inform us whether the sixteen stations that are provided for in this bill have all been recommended by the superintendent?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir; they are all recommended by the superintendent.

A MEMBER. Oh, he would recommend anything.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to see injustice done to that gentleman. He is a very careful officer. But the question is, should these sixteen stations be left to his discretion? I would be perfectly willing to leave them there and not force their construction immediately.

Mr. IRION. Mr. Speaker, I think it is proper to say that the superintendent explained to the committee that it was necessary that these new stations should be authorized two years in advance, and that is the reason why he recommends to at this time establish all these new ones. Before the two years have elapsed he will have constructed those already authorized by law, and then, if these are authorized, he can go on, because the appropriation will have been already made. He says it is necessary they should be authorized at least two years in advance.

Mr. RANDALL. Then we understand the matter exactly. These sixteen are in addition to the twenty already authorized but not yet constructed, so that we shall be giving him discretion as to thirty-six.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And let us understand also that there are more authorized now than he can construct in two fiscal years.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is a good deal of division of opinion on this question. We have no quorum here; it is late, and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the House that if we can dispose of this bill the Committee on Commerce intend to trespass further upon the courtesy of the House to pass a few other bills which have been prepared and reported by that committee. They are routine bills which probably will not lead to any discussion, and when we get through with this we shall ask the House to take them up.

The House divided on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 36, noes 61.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is not a quorum present, and I think this matter had better be passed over, and, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, let us take up something else that we can dispose of without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] asks unanimous consent that the bill now under consideration be passed over for the purpose of taking up some other bill the title of which he has not yet indicated.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, the House by unanimous consent gave the Committee on Commerce this day for the consideration of these bills. We have considered all the bills except this one, which is last in the list. I think the House should do the fair thing by the Committee on Commerce, and allow this bill to be considered and disposed of even though there may not be a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. A single objection would prevent that.

Mr. RANDALL. The House gave unanimous consent, also, that it should be a House, and whenever it is discovered that it is not a House there are two motions in order.

Mr. DUNN. One of which has been made.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted some remarks. [See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed to the pending bill by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. IRION].

A MEMBER. Let the amendment be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, after the word "recommend," add "one on Lake Ontario, New York, at or near the mouth of the Niagara River, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I have an impression that if this House were advised of the needs of this service and the magnitude of its operations, despite the fact that there is no quorum present, this bill would pass.

I ask leave to read a few statistics showing in the first place the number of wrecks we have had on our coast, which extends a distance of 10,000 miles, within the last fourteen years. They number 3,546. Of this number there have been on the coast of Maine, 524; New Hampshire, 54; Massachusetts, 802; Rhode Island, 176; Connecticut, 89; New York, 352; New Jersey, 399; Delaware, 115; Maryland, 98; Virginia, 251; North Carolina, 231; South Carolina, 53; Georgia, 27; Florida, 181; Alabama, 8; Mississippi, 8; Louisiana, 20; Texas, 158. Now, these statistics tell the whole story of the nature of our coast and the points where casualties occur. Those occurring on the coast of Maine are owing to its peculiar conformation, which is skirted with rocks, with sunken ledges, and with islands. Then the climate of Maine and that of all our northern coast is unpropitious to mariners, the severe storms in fall, winter, and spring making that an exceedingly dangerous coast.

Then we come to Massachusetts; and we have two very important capes, one stretching 12 miles into the Atlantic, the other 40 miles, and nearly 40 miles northward; and then there are the Elizabeth Islands and the Island of Nantucket, compelling all vessels after they weather the coast of Cape Cod to still hug the coast through a tortuous, narrow, shallow channel, the northeast and easterly winds driving vessels upon that coast, so that, as I am informed by the Light-House Board, there were forty wrecks seen there on one morning. As we go farther south we get a different conformation of coast, but still very dangerous, with outlying sand-bars. This is the character of the seaboard from the southern portion of Rhode Island down to and below Hatteras. After we leave Hatteras the coast trends to the westward; and vessels have a free offing until they approach Southern Florida. This again is very dangerous, in consequence of the coral reefs; and a vessel is obliged to hug the shore in getting between that and the Bahama Islands.

But after traversing this channel, rounding Florida, and getting into the Gulf, there is an almost total exemption from accidents of this character. Within fourteen years there have been only thirty-six accidents east of Texas on the entire Gulf coast; and the accidents upon the coast of Texas, which have amounted to a little over one hundred, have been almost wholly upon its western extremity, where it trends to the north, and vessels are driven ashore by the "northers." This illustrates why the life-saving stations are more numerous upon our northern coast.

We have in the first district eleven life-saving stations. That comprises the coast of Maine and New Hampshire. In the second district, Massachusetts, we have twenty-one life-saving stations on all that perilous coast, with all its capes and islands, where we have had within fourteen years eight hundred and two wrecks and in a single day forty, a coast where, in the course of a year, fifty thousand vessels pass. Then we have the third district, Rhode Island and New York, where the wrecks have been five hundred and twenty-eight, the life-saving stations numbering thirty-seven. This number is much larger proportionally than those upon the coast of Massachusetts. This partly because a large share of our foreign commerce, carried in very large vessels, in reaching the harbor of New York, passes along the coast of Long Island and New Jersey, so that a larger life-saving force is requisite, and it is necessary at times to mass the forces from several points.

Then again, it is exceedingly difficult sometimes for the men engaged in this service to carry their apparatus, when they are obliged to carry it by their own physical force, going waist-deep in water and knee-deep in sand, dragging at times a weight of many hundred pounds. Under these circumstances frequent life-saving stations are of course required. In the fourth district, New Jersey, with three hundred and ninety-nine wrecks, many of them large wrecks, involving great loss of human life, we have forty-one life-saving stations. In the fifth district, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, with three hundred and thirty-one wrecks, we have seventeen life-saving stations. In the sixth district, Virginia and North Carolina, running to Cape Hatteras, we have twenty-eight. In the seventh district, including North Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, with one hundred and ninety-nine wrecks, we have fourteen life-saving stations. Then in the eighth district, embracing Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas—a very large extent of territory, but the wrecks being comparatively few, numbering only two hundred and fifty-six, there being very little danger there from the fact that the winds blow from the north and blow out to sea instead of toward the land—we have eight life-saving stations.

Mr. REAGAN. There are only four on the coast of Texas.

Mr. DAVIS. The number I have given have been authorized by law, according to this statement, which I get from the Light-House Board.

Mr. REAGAN. In order to settle this question, I asked the commissioner when he was before the committee, and he admitted there were only four now established, although there are five provided for by law.

Mr. DAVIS. This number of life-saving stations is undoubtedly authorized, although they may not all be built. This statement includes one outside of Texas, taking in the entire Gulf coast. I will read in a moment another statement showing the magnitude of the operations of this Life-Saving Service.

Mr. Speaker, the table given below contains a summary of the results in the field of life-saving operations since the introduction of the present system:

General summary of disasters which have occurred within the scope of life-saving operations from November 1, 1871 (date of introduction of present system), to close of fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

Total number of disasters	2,918
Total value of vessels	$35,210,075
Total value of cargoes	16,553,619
Total value of property involved	51,763,694
Total value of property saved	36,277,929

Here is a result of some practical utility, showing it is not simply a humane service, but that it is a profitable service to commerce:

Total value of property lost	$15,485,765
Total number of persons involved	25,693
Total number of persons saved	25,236
Total number of lives lost	457
Total number of persons succored	4,829
Total number of days' succor afforded	13,313

Now, there is a result creditable to our country, creditable to the cause of humanity, and it seems to me it amply justifies a liberal expenditure in favor of this service.

I was going to remark, Mr. Speaker, that it is perhaps unnecessary to go any further into detail to show the importance of this service. It has been now in existence some fifteen years, and it shows these results. It is a service which of course at a glance, in a single moment, we see the nature of. No one can describe, perhaps, or even approach a description of the accumulated horrors of one case of shipwreck. I recollect a celebrated orator stated it was impossible to convey an adequate conception of the horrors of war unless you described a single case, that of a family, for instance, where the mother and her lovely daughters lived in happiness and apparent safety. A party of soldiers inflamed with wine and lust approach that dwelling. I need proceed no further; every parent understands the whole history of crime and cruelty.

Neither can we form an adequate idea of the fearful aggregate of suffering, terror, and death connected with the three thousand shipwrecks which have occurred upon our coast within the last fifteen years. They do not make that vivid impression upon us that a single instance would, because the imagination revolts from the conception of such stupendous calamities. Time will not permit, Mr. Speaker, even if I had the ability, the attempt to impress this House with the unequaled and accumulated horrors of a single shipwreck, where human beings are, in midwinter, and in the midst of darkness and a raging tempest, driven upon a reef far from the shore, the masts falling, the vessel breaking in pieces, and a watery grave yawning before them. No man can imagine a death accompanied and anticipated with more of horror than this.

Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell—
  Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still the brave—
Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful yell,
  As eager to anticipate their grave;
And the sea yawn'd around her like a hell,
  And down she suck'd with her the whirling wave,
Like one who grapples with his enemy,
And tries to strangle him before he die.

And first one universal shriek there rush'd,
  Louder than the loud ocean, like a crash
Of echoing thunder; and then all was hushed
  Save the wild wind and the remorseless dash
Of billows; but at intervals there gush'd,
  Accompanied with a convulsive splash,
A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.

This is a description by the greatest save one of those poets who have made our language the instrument of their imagination of a shipwreck in former times. Happily that description will apply in but few instances to-day. Now, at the last moment, when hope has given way to despair, and strong men, feeble women, and helpless children are alike in the presence of apparently inevitable death, at that moment a light appears, streaming upon them from the shore like a ray from heaven penetrating this nether world, and bringing hope and joy to those despairing souls. A line is shot high in the air and reaches and is made fast to the vessel, the life-car follows it, and the life-boat comes, and they are saved. Mr. Speaker, no man can be so destitute of grateful reverence that he would not, upon reaching the shore, thank God for his deliverance, and invoke his choicest blessings upon the brave men who had saved him at the peril of their lives and upon that humane government which had furnished the means of rescue.

Mr. Speaker, one hundred years ago in one of the States of this Union a life-saving society was formed. During all this period it has continued uninterruptedly its humane labors, until it has to-day fifty-two life-saving stations upon the coast of that State—double the number that the United States has placed there. I refer to the Massachusetts Humane Society, which is the parent of our United States Life-Saving Service, and of the modern life-saving service in Europe as well as in this country. Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth which I have in part the honor to represent here has, in her Colonial, Revolutionary, and State history of two hundred and fifty years done something for her own honor, something for the welfare, progress, and glory of our common country and for history. She has crowded into the space of two and a half centuries names, deeds, ideas, and institutions which will inspire every generation of her children; but I question whether there be a single fact in all her glowing annals of which they have better reason to be proud than of the spirit, labors, and results of this association of her citizens.

We have also a right to be proud of our national Life-Saving Service. It is simply unequaled in the efficiency of its organization, the excellence and variety of its appliances and methods, and the courage and skill of its officers and men. In its humane work it knows no latitude or longitude. Its spirit and purpose are wide as humanity and far-reaching as the necessities and sufferings of the race. This spirit is not confined to our country or time or even to the Christian era. Rome, ruthless and bloody as was her policy, conferred a special honor upon him who saved the life of a fellow-being. "Nothing human is alien to me" was the sentiment uttered by a heathen philanthropist more than two thousand years ago, and that will remain for all time the vindication of the claims of humanity and the brotherhood of the race. This spirit conferred immortality upon the words of the dying Sydney: "Take it, I pray thee; for thy necessities are greater than mine." Words simple as childhood, but sublime as the heavens that have made the very ground upon which this heroic soul ebbed his life away sacred to history and humanity forever!

Mr. Speaker, this bill should not fail. Upon it both sides of this House and the members from every section of our country can act as one man. It appeals irresistibly to the best and tenderest emotions of our common nature. Let us forget all minor considerations and remember only that we are men whose duty it is to succor and save our fellow-creatures.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has convinced me that this is a matter of so much importance that it ought not to be passed upon in the House without a quorum, and as he seems satisfied that there is danger of its not passing now, and as it is certain that there is no quorum present, believing that a quorum ought to consider it, and since it is within ten minutes of 5 o'clock, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I only desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that an adjournment is of course the defeat of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I confess I have been greatly moved by the eloquent——

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I beg pardon; I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has submitted a motion, which is now pending, that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I confess, as I have said, that I was greatly moved by the eloquent words and appeals of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I should follow him distinctly in giving execution to those words if the proposition before the House was either to establish a life-saving service or to break down the system now in force.

But it is neither. We know by the statements sent to us by the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service that he could not within two years execute the construction of these stations to the number already authorized by law. We have now two hundred and three stations. We have one hundred and fifty-seven of those on the Atlantic shores, thirty-eight upon the lakes, more in other directions; I think but one or two on the Pacific coast.

No one for a moment would underrate the necessity, the absolute requirement of humanity, to establish these stations. But I do think that under the circumstances, with the language and recommendation so far as I have it before me in the report, differing somewhat from the recommendation as presented by the Committee on Commerce, we should be allowed to look into this matter a little further, and see whether Congress should at this time say there should be thirty-six additional stations. There are twenty now authorized by law neither constructed nor contracted for; and this bill provides sixteen in addition, and ten of those sixteen, if I caught the reading correctly, are on the Atlantic coast, while one or perhaps two are on the Pacific, and some on the lakes.

I think a full House should pass on this measure. But I am not going to stand here and prevent the passage of the bill if there should be no diversity of opinion as to the propriety of its passage. Hence I do not want to obstruct this proceeding by calling a quorum. But I do say that the statement I have in my hand and the statements that have been read are inconsistent as coming from the superintendent of this service.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the previous question on the pending bill and the amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. IRION], which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 17.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was passed.

Mr. IRION moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand all the bills embraced in the special order for to-day have now been disposed of. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the gentleman from Texas to withhold that motion for the present. I have here a very short bill reported by the Committee on Commerce which was not included in the order, and which I should like to ask the House to consider at this time.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to the gentleman and withdraw the motion to adjourn.

TOWING VESSELS.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 3037) relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any steam-vessel engaged in the business of towing vessels, rafts, or water craft of any kind, and not carrying passengers, may be authorized and licensed by the board of supervising inspectors to carry on board such a number of persons, in addition to its crew, as the board of supervising inspectors, in their judgment, think necessary to carry on its business, not exceeding, however, one person to every ton of measurement.

SEC. 2. That every steam-vessel licensed under the foregoing section shall carry and have on board, in accessible places, one life-preserver for every person allowed to be carried, in addition to those provided for the crew of such vessel.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

Strike out all after the words "licensed by the," in the fifth line of section 1, and insert as follows:

"Supervising inspector of the district in which said steamer shall be employed, to carry on board such number of persons, in addition to its crew, as the supervising inspector, in his judgment, shall deem necessary to carry on the legitimate business of such towing steamers, not exceeding, however, one person to every net ton of measurement of said steamer: Provided, however, That the persons so allowed to be carried shall not be carried for hire."

Mr. RANDALL. Is that bill embraced in the special order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RANDALL. Reserving the right to object, I will be glad to hear a statement by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Illinois will be permitted to make a brief statement, the right to object being reserved.

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will state that the amendment was suggested by the supervising inspector-general. The object of the bill is this: Under the present laws of the United States a steam-tug or steam-vessel going to the rescue of a vessel ashore is forbidden to carry even the owner of that vessel. A steam-tug going to the rescue of a vessel ashore is forbidden by law even to take the crew off and carry them ashore. The object of the bill is simply to correct that evil. I will say it originates with the Chicago Tug-Owners' Association, which has had occasion to be fined once or twice for doing that, by which human life has been saved.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be passed.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois incorporate in the RECORD the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. Does General Dumont, the Supervising Inspector-General, approve the bill?

Mr. DUNHAM. This bill was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury and I suppose by him to General Dumont, and it was returned by the Department with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the letter of the Supervising Inspector-General also be printed.

Mr. DUNHAM. It will.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The report (by Mr. DUNHAM) is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3037) relating to the "licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews," submit the following report:

Existing law is so strict in its terms that tugs or towing vessels are forbidden from doing work which frequently becomes almost absolutely necessary to save both life and property.

The bill of the House was by your committee referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and under his direction the Supervising Inspector-General of Steam-Vessels suggests an amendment to the bill, giving his reasons therefor.

We submit his communication in full as a part of our report:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE SUPERVISING INSPECTOR-GENERAL OF STEAM-VESSELS,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the clerk of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, inclosing H. R. bill 3037, "relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews," and requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to favor the committee with such suggestions touching the merits of the bill as he might deem proper, and the propriety of its passage, the whole referred to this office for report.

I have the honor to report thereon that the general purpose of the bill is unobjectionable, but I would respectfully suggest that in view of the fact that the board of supervising inspectors are only in session during a couple of weeks in each year, and then at a season when navigation is nearly at a standstill on account of the inland lakes and rivers being frozen over, that the purpose of the bill would be better accomplished by striking out from the first section of the bill all after the word "the" in the fifth line thereof, and substituting therefor the words following, to wit: "supervising inspector of the district in which said steamer shall be employed to carry on board such number of persons, in addition to its crew, as the supervising inspector in his judgment shall deem necessary to carry on the legitimate business of such towing steamers, not exceeding, however, one person to every net ton of measurement of said steamer: provided, however, that the persons so allowed to be carried shall not be carried for hire."

I have prepared bill H. R. 3037, inclosed herein, so as to show its reading as amended.

Very respectfully,

JAS. A. DUMONT,
Supervising Inspector-General.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

In further explanation of the bill, we attach hereto the memorial of the Chicago Tug-owners' Association, giving reasons in detail why this legislation is required:

"For a number of years the owners and masters of steam-tugs plying in harbors of the great lakes and rivers of the Northwest have been greatly annoyed by the imposition of fines for violation of the law in carrying persons on their vessels in the course of their business, without having first obtained licenses to carry passengers.

"It is impossible for this class of tugs, on account of their peculiar construction and limited space, to carry on board the boats and life-saving apparatus required by law for vessels engaged in passenger traffic, and hence they are not permitted to carry any one on board, not a member of the crew, for any purpose or distance whatever.

"It is next to impossible for this class of vessels to successfully and profitably carry on their business unless they are allowed at times to carry one or more persons in addition to their crew.

"They are frequently called upon, when employed to tow a vessel, to take to her the whole or part of a crew of seamen or stevedores engaged for her, and whose presence is required on board before the vessel can enter port or depart on her voyage, as the case may be. Every person transported, it matters not how short a distance, and whether free or for hire, is, under the law as now construed, considered a passenger; and the vessel so employed, unless provided with a license permitting her to engage in passenger traffic, is liable to pay a fine of $500. With the laws now in force an owner of a tug, unless a member of the crew, can not take passage for any distance or purpose on his own vessel without violating the law.

"A tug carrying a life-saving crew and their boat and apparatus to a vessel, for the purpose of saving the lives of her crew and passengers, or rescuing a drowning crew from a sinking ship, violates the present law, and as no class of vessels are more frequently called upon to perform a service of this kind, it is clearly in the interests of humanity that they should be allowed the privileges which this proposed amendment will afford them.

"Numerous instances can be given in which fines have been imposed for a violation of the law under circumstances of great hardship.

"The local inspectors of boilers and hulls have been applied to for relief, and they, with the tug owners of this port, have called the attention of the board of supervising inspectors to the condition of affairs, and although the board fully appreciates the necessity for the relief requested, the members express themselves powerless, under the present state of the laws, to give it.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the amendment proposed by the Supervising Inspector-General.

PORT OF ENTRY, MOUNT DESERT FERRY, MAINE.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bills 1026 and 1153, reported by the Committee on Commerce, be taken up. I do not think there can be any objection whatever to either of them, and I am sure that they will not elicit any discussion.

The SPEAKER. Which one does the gentleman call up first?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I call up the bill (H. R. 1026) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine. It is a bill which creates no new office and involves no additional expense whatever to the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will allow me to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. The gentleman from Illinois says he insists upon the motion to adjourn.

The House divided on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 25, noes 40.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 1026) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the port of Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine, be, and the same is hereby, established as a port of entry, subject to the same regulations, privileges, and facilities as other ports of entry in the United States: Provided, That the official duties of said port shall be performed under the direction of the collector of customs for the district of Frenchman's Bay, and by a deputy detailed by him for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the right to object until I hear the report read.

The report was read.

Mr. O'FERRALL. A favorable report was made upon this bill in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COWLES. I object.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope my friend will not object. This bill does not involve an extra dollar of expense to the Government.

Mr. COWLES. We shall not have any more bills passed this evening without a quorum.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MILIKEN. If any man object to the bill on account of additional cost to the Government, I will move to amend the bill so as to obviate that objection.

The SPEAKER. But the bill is not before the House. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] objects and states that he will object to any other business being done without a quorum.

Mr. DUNN. I insist on my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for immediate consideration.

There was no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts have permission to print the evidence taken before them under the resolution authorizing them to ascertain the number and compensation of the officers and employés of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 33.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, rose.

Mr. EDEN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The House having concluded the consideration of the bills for which this day was set apart, the regular order is the unfinished business. The Clerk will report the first unfinished business, which, according to the recollection of the Chair, is a bill in relation to the claims of States against the Government of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The request for unanimous consent can not be entertained unless the motion to adjourn is withdrawn, and also the demand for the regular order.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to—ayes 47, nays 24,

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to have the bill placed on the Calendar, inasmuch as at some future time it is my purpose to present some views upon the subject-matter of the bill and other questions properly connected with it, in order that it may appear to the Senate and the country how completely some of the most commanding features involved in the subject are overlooked entirely by the committee in the report.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That Mr. RANDALL L. GIBSON be, and he hereby is, appointed a member of the Committee on Commerce, to serve in the place of Mr. CHARLES W. JONES during his present temporary absence from the Senate.

Mr. BECK. If there is no objection I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROPERTY REMOVED TO INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. MAXEY. I see by the RECORD of February 17 last that I offered some resolutions for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, to inquire into the propriety of such legislation as might procure jurisdiction to the Federal courts in adjacent States as to matters within the limits of the Indian Territory. The resolutions were printed in the RECORD, but they were not, I suppose by my fault, printed separately as a document. I ask that they be so printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves to print the resolution mentioned by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] on the 16th of February.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into what legislation may be necessary in order to subject property removed from any State or Territory into the Indian Territory, that is to say, into the country occupied by the five civilized tribes, to forced sale, levy, and execution, upon a writ of execution or other proper writ issued upon a judgment or decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction to hear and determine between the parties to the suit.

2. What legislation may be necessary to subject property removed as aforesaid into the Indian Territory aforesaid to writ of attachment or other auxiliary writ duly issued by such court as aforesaid at the commencement of suit or pending the litigation.

And said committee is directed to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the resolution be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has already been made.

NICARAGUAN CLAIMS CONVENTION.

Mr. MORGAN. On Saturday I offered a concurrent resolution in regard to the Nicaraguan claims convention. I merely wish to have it referred to the Committee on Nicaraguan Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay the resolution before the Senate.

The resolution was considered, and referred to the Select Committee to Inquire into Claims of Citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua, as follows:

Whereas the following resolution was passed in the Senate on March 10, 1882, and in the House of Representatives on the 16th March, 1882:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to bring to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua the necessity of arranging by a convention for final settlement of all unadjusted claims existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of Nicaragua and claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua;" and

Whereas no information has been given to Congress of any practical progress that has been made in the adjustment of the claims of the citizens of the United States against the Republic of Nicaragua:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to bring this subject to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua, with a view to securing the prompt and full satisfaction of the just claims of the citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua.

SCHUYLKILL RIVER EAST SIDE RAILROAD.

Mr. CAMERON. If the routine morning business is closed I desire to call up a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order of business is closed, and the Calendar is in order. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the Calendar was called I addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia wish to present a "concurrent or other" resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; but before the Calendar was called I tried to get the ear of the Chair.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator give way to me for a moment?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Not to take up the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON. No; but to take up a bill which will not occupy three minutes.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 880) granting the right of way to the Schuylkill River East Side Railroad Company through the arsenal and naval asylum grounds at Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire of the Senator if he anticipates that the bill will lead to debate?

Mr. CAMERON. None at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 15, after the word "Navy," to strike out the following words:

Which board, in assessing said damages, shall take into consideration the benefits, if any, to the remaining property of the United States from the construction and use of said road through the grounds aforesaid, and also from the construction of the bulkhead hereinafter mentioned, in the extinguishment of said damages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following additional provision:

And provided further, That no trains of said company shall be allowed to stop or stand on said naval asylum grounds, except under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy; and that no bells or whistles shall be sounded upon any train or engine of said company while on said grounds; and that the tracks of such railroad on said naval asylum grounds shall be so arranged and paved as to permit the easy passage of vehicles across the same; and that such watchman or watchmen shall be kept by said railroad company on said grounds, at its expense, as the Secretary of the Navy shall deem necessary for the protection of persons and property on or in the neighborhood of said railroad on said grounds: And provided further also, That the said company shall construct a proper switch and siding upon said arsenal grounds, and suitable means for crossing to the wharf on the said arsenal grounds, for the purpose of receiving and shipping freight by water.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. The last amendment refers only to the asylum grounds. In the report which I have before me the committee suggest that the same rule shall apply to both the arsenal grounds and the asylum grounds.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. The naval asylum grounds are where it is desired that the trains shall not stop or stand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On page 2, has the amendment of the committee striking out the payment by the company of the value of the land been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator is mistaken. It does not strike out the payment; it strikes out the clause in regard to considering the advantages to be gained to the United States by the building of the road. That was in the original bill, and it was stricken out by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The provision still exists then?

Mr. CAMERON. The provision exists that the company shall pay damages to be assessed by a board of two Army officers and one officer of the Navy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But suppose the company does not pay the damages?

Mr. CAMERON. Then they do not get the title to the ground; the road will not go through. It has all to be approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy before they get the title. If the Senator can improve the bill in any way, of course I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to make that a little secure. In line 15, after the word "Navy," I move to insert:

And the payment of said damages so fixed shall be a condition precedent to the exercise of the rights by this act granted.

Mr. CAMERON. That is right. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the bill makes a grant of the whole river front along these grounds. If they were not used by the Government for such purposes there would remain a continuous grant of river front without any consideration, which could not be disposed of while the law remains as it is now proposed to enact it. I think there should be a provision that it should be subject to further legislation if the Government should require or desire to sell the grounds. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to that point.

Mr. CAMERON. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that if the line is located immediately on the river front where the land is low and to-day worthless, it will be filled up and made valuable by the railroad company. At the same time they agree to put bulkheads along the water front, so that if at any time the United States should want to use the river front the Government can have it in a better condition than it is to-day.

Mr. CONGER. How long is this stretch of arsenal and asylum grounds?

Mr. CAMERON. About 350 feet.

Mr. CONGER. If this stretch of grounds along the Schuylkill can not be used for Government purposes now, and the grounds were abandoned for naval purposes or for arsenal or asylum purposes, and they should be sold, it would not be well that the whole river front, which would be the most valuable part of it, should be in the hands of a railroad company by a simple grant considered to be perpetual.

Mr. CAMERON. The location of this line is subject to the control of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; and before the company locate the line either on the river front or back from it, it must be first approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. I think every provision necessary has been made in the bill except the one which was suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], which has been agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Every provision suggested by the Departments has been complied with?

Mr. CAMERON. All of them.

Mr. CONGER. But the point I make is this: If this should be relinquished, here remains the river front in possession of the railroad company without any power whatever in the Government to sell it or control it.

Mr. CAMERON. I will say in reply that that would be a question of damages which would have to be considered by those officers before they give the right of way. If they are going to take that so as to render it valueless to the Government, of course they will have to pay for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When the bill is reported to the Senate I shall move to amend the last amendment of the committee. I can not do it in order now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last amendment will be reserved for a separate vote. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the last committee amendment by inserting, after the word "trains," in line 28, the words "or cars or locomotives."

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call attention to lines 29, 30, and 31, where it is said that no trains or cars or locomotives of the company shall be alllowed to stop or stand on these grounds, "except under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy." That gives the Secretary of the Navy authority to make a regulation which shall allow this strip of land, which they say they need for passage, to be occupied as a station, as a train-yard, as a place to take and receive freight from the water side, and all that, if they can persuade some Secretary of the Navy to make a regulation of that kind. If I correctly understand it, all that they can with any propriety ask of the United States about this is a mere right to cross and not to take this little strip of land along the Schuylkill there, and right in front of the asylum grounds, as a place for doing business. Therefore, I want to take the judgment of the Senate on striking out this exception, so that they shall only have the right of passage. I accordingly move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out, in lines 29, 30 and 31, the words:

Except under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

So that it will read:

That no trains or cars or locomotives of said company shall be allowed to stop or stand on—

This little strip where they go through these grounds.

Mr. CAMERON. That language was put in there for the benefit of the Government, not for the benefit of the railroad company. It is presumable at least that the Government will want to use that line of railroad and will want a siding there, and therefore the cars must stop so that it may handle its own freights. It would be an advantage to the Government to do that. If the trains are simply allowed to pass to and fro, it will be no advantage whatever to the Government except the advantage it may gain from the sale of the property. That language was put in for a purpose, and I think a very good one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can fix that, if that is the object.

Mr. CAMERON. That is the object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can fix it by striking out this clause and adding to the description of trains, cars, and locomotives the simple words "other than those in use from time to time for the United States."

Mr. CAMERON. Very well; that will do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can fix it all in that way, if that is what you mean.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that there is no earthly objection to such an amendment. The only reason for the provision was that in one case, the arsenal grounds, the Secretary of War thought it was in the interest of the Government to require a switch to be placed there for the use of the Government, for its own purposes, through the arsenal grounds, the strip being only 200 feet in length and 60 feet in width, and possibly the Navy Department would require a train to stop on the asylum grounds for their own purposes and for no other purpose. It could not be used in any other way or for general traffic.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senate will agree to the amendment I have proposed I will move to amend by adding after the description of these trains, cars, and locomotives by an exclusion of "other than those doing business for the United States."

Mr. GORMAN. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CAMERON. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 29, after the word "grounds," it is proposed to strike out the words "except under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy;" and in line 28, after the word "locomotives," to insert the words "other than those doing business for the United States;" so as to read:

That no trains or cars or locomotives, other than those doing business for the United States, of said company shall be allowed to stop or stand on said naval asylum grounds, and that no bells or whistles, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In line 34, after the word "paved," where it says very properly that these grounds shall be so arranged and paved as to make a suitable crossing, I move to add, "and kept always in good order;" so as to read:

So arranged and paved and kept always in good order as to permit the easy passage of vehicles across the same.

I do that to make it continuous.

Mr. CAMERON. There is no objection to that. The amendment would improve the clause very much.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the end of the amendment, after the period in line 44, I move to insert:

Any violation of any of the provisions of this act by said company, or its successors or assigns, shall work a forfeiture of all rights granted by this act.

So as to keep a squeeze on them all the time.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether there is any reservation of the right to modify or repeal this act of Congress hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not. I thought of that, but it seemed to me as it was a grant of a small right of way, if we got the forfeiture in case they did not do exactly what we authorized them to do, it would be enough; but that is a thing worth considering perhaps.

The bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me a moment to allow me to call up Order of Business 339?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If it is not to prejudice the motion I wish to make.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I think it will take no time.

Mr. DAWES. I ask to be allowed to make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. This bill will take but little time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir, if it is not to the prejudice of the motion I make during the morning hour. I know I can not make it after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are but five minutes of the morning hour left.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move then—and possibly I can yield to the Senator from Arkansas better afterward or with less prejudice—to take up the resolution of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] providing for the consideration of executive nominations in open session.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the Senator from Virginia to let me get up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. At 2 o'clock that can come up.

Mr. DAWES. I submit to the Senator whether the public service would not be promoted more by proceeding to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill now.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If on the motion to take up I were to undertake to answer the Senator from Massachusetts it would consume the whole of the time, but I would say I think not. I have tried here for four or five weeks to get this matter before the Senate in some form without myself propounding a resolution. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] objected in a way to my calling up his resolution. He gave notice that he would call it up on Wednesday of last week, and he gave notice that he would call it up on Thursday——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Chair will permit me to ask what rule there is which makes this motion non-debatable. I was just looking at the rules. I will not debate it if the Chair thinks it is in violation of the rules to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the rule read in a moment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Very well. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable, I know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to proceed to the consideration of any business at this hour is not debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then it was not proper for these Senators to have asked me to yield. That was debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule referred to will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the rule under which debate is denied. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution named by him.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the Senate shall act, if the Chair pleases, I desire to draw the distinction (if I must do it by an appeal from the decision of the Chair) between that rule and the rule which covers the matter now under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair. Upon that question the Senator has a right to be heard.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. On page 150 of the Manual there is a provision in the rules that a motion to lay on the table is not debatable; but there is no provision in the rules anywhere which says that a motion to take up business from the table is not debatable. I have not offered a proposition that any Senator could have objected to and carried over until to-morrow. I have made a motion to take from the table a resolution that has been slumbering there; and I say there is no rule that forbids debate on such a motion. Now, if the Chair can show me a rule that does forbid it, I will yield with all deference. I concede that there are motions which are not debatable. They are named in the rules, which then proceed:

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

There are no other motions than those four which are non-debatable under the rules, unless there be some rule that is not in this Manual of 1886 which is before me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the last clause of Rule VIII, if he has it before him. The Chair will again have it read. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a matter pending before the Senate. The rule provides that—

All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

This clause is in addition to the rule to which the Senator has referred, and has been adopted within the last year or two.

Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That this motion is not debatable? I withdraw the appeal, and ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take up the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal being withdrawn, the question recurs on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution referred to, which will be read for information.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not going to debate it. I should have no objection to the Senator from Virginia making this motion if it did not interfere with other business; but inasmuch as it does so interfere, I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion now and let the matter go over, and I will try to call up the resolution within the next two or three days so that it shall be considered when it can have a fair opportunity for discussion. I do not think it would get a fair discussion this morning, inasmuch as the Indian appropriation bill is pressing. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his motion, and I will call up the resolution within the next two or three days.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will just say that this is the fourth day fixed for the consideration of this resolution, and all the time there has been interposed something that has been called more important business; all the time there has been going on the consideration of nominations, all the time men are being torn down and others built up in executive session. Now, if the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Connecticut will agree that a day shall be fixed for this matter I shall be certainly willing to withdraw my motion to take it up.

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal to the Senator from Virginia——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must again remind Senators that this debate is out of order, but it is not within the power of the Chair to stop Senators.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to make a request of the Senator from Virginia. I ask him to withdraw his motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in question that I may move to take up Order of Business 347, being the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Just what I expected would come. I insist on my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is debate in order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. A pension bill for Union soldiers and everything—— ["Order!" "Order!"]

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. LOGAN March 22, 1886, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the sessions of the Senate commonly known as executive sessions, so far as they apply to nominations, confirmations, or rejections, shall hereafter be held with open doors, and that a public record of the same shall be kept the same as in legislative sessions.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must again remind Senators that this motion is not debatable under the rules.

Mr. HARRIS. I inquire whether there is an appropriation bill asking consideration this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has already been advised of that.

Mr. HARRIS. My attention was diverted and I did not know what measures were proposed in antagonism.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to debate, but I desire to ask permission to appeal to the Senator from Virginia to let this go over. I assure him that I will call it up. I desire to make some remarks on it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion? Upon the ruling of the Chair made the other day, that resolution as it now stands is clearly out of order. It is an amendment to the rules, and the Senator from Illinois I think will modify it and give the one day's notice before he calls it up. That would probably determine the Senate, and probably the Senator from Virginia. It would necessarily go over.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, and I intended to make the modification.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I intended to consult the Senator from Illinois before I called it up.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point that it is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate at the present moment. The Senate has already decided to take the vote by yeas and nays on the question of taking it up. When it is taken up, the Chair will decide any question that arises upon it.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on that suggestion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I would rather have the call of the yeas and nays.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and I withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. LOGAN. Although I could not get this laid over, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 52; as follows:

YEAS—7.

Bowen,	Logan,	Vance,	Wilson of Iowa.
George,	Riddleberger,	Van Wyck,

NAYS—52.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Hawley,	Morrill,

Blair,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pugh,
Brown,	Evarts,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Fair,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Call,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cameron,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Stanford,
Chace,	Gray,	Miller,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Voorhees,

ABSENT—17.

Camden,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.
Gorman,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Hale,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Spooner,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to give notice of an amendment I intend to offer to the resolution in relation to the consideration of executive nominations with open doors. I ask that the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to add to the resolution:

And so much of section 2, Rule XXXVI, and section 2, Rule XXXVIII, of the standing rules of the Senate as conflict with, or is inconsistent with, the above, is, to the extent of such inconsistency, rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. Wait until the bill is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Now, Mr President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAWES. For a moment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask leave to call up Order of Business

339, a bill the consideration of which I do not think will require but a moment. I should like to have it considered at this time.

Mr. DAWES. That requires unanimous consent, and I will take the sense of the Senate. If every other Senator but myself shall consent I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent of the Senate that, waiving informally the pending bill, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1805) for the relief of Miss Rosa Wallace.

Mr. BLAIR. I object. I object to any yielding the floor to interfere with the motion I desire to make for considering pension business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it now be read for amendment, the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations being considered first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be taken. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, in the appropriations for pay of Indian agents, line 80, before "Winnebago," to strike out "Omaha and;" and in line 81, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

At the Winnebago agency, at $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 1, line 114, after the word "all," to decrease the total appropriation for pay of Indian agents from $89,300 to $88,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after the words "Indian affairs," at the end of line 140, to insert "and of such person as may be detailed to accompany him;" after the word "employed," at the end of line 143, to insert "on duty in the field;" and in line 146, after the word "employés," to insert "not otherwise provided for;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents, and of their offices, and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and of such person as may be detailed to accompany him, also traveling and incidental expenses of five special agents, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law; for pay of employés not otherwise provided for, and for pay of five special agents, at $2,000 per annum each, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, in section 1, line 165, after the word "physician," to strike out "$1,200;" and in line 166, after the word "teachers," to strike out "one thousand three" and insert "two thousand five;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of physician and two teachers, $2,500; in all, $49,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, in section 1, line 175, after the word "physician," to strike out "$1,200;" in line 176, after the word "teacher," to strike out "$800;" and in line 177, after the word "treaty," to insert "$2,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of physician and teacher, as per thirteenth article of same treaty, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Chippewas of the Mississippi, in section 1, line 193, after "1867," to strike out "four thousand" and insert "three thousand five hundred;" and, in line 194, after the word "all," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For the support of a school or schools upon said reservation, during the pleasure of the President, in accordance with third article of treaty of March 19, 1867, $3,500; in all, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out the following clause from lines 210 to 217 of section 1:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the several tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for such modification of existing treaties with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available; but any agreement made shall not take effect until ratified by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to line 303.

Mr. CONGER. I see in the item just read, and also on page 13, line 301, there is a provision for supplying to each female, seven hundred in number, over twelve years of age, among other things, with a pair of woolen hose each, and in the paragraph commencing in line 309, there is a provision to supply three hundred and fifty boys and three hundred and fifty girls with a pair of woolen hose for each. This is for the Crows up in the northern country. In the interest of economy I want to inquire whether there could not be some arrangement by which one pair of hose should go around a family of three or four children. It is a country where there is a good deal of snow. Would it not be economy to keep one pair of hose, say, for five or six of the boys and girls, and let only those who had these articles go out into the snow?

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Michigan had not been one of the party who made this treaty wherein we agreed to give them so many hose for the girls and so many hose for the boys. Then the suggestion he now makes would have been provided for. This is in exact fulfillment of the treaty. The committee felt, when this bill was finished, if they had provided for the exact fulfillment of all the treaties in it they would have accomplished considerable.

Mr. CONGER. I inquire whether the Senator was a member of the commission that made the treaty.

Mr. DAWES. No. If I had been a member of it I certainly should have taken the same view the Senator from Michigan has if I had had the same information he has; but not having been a member of it, and finding that we had a treaty that required just this much to be done, both branches have walked up to the fulfillment of the treaty, and they have not gone beyond that in this paragraph. In other paragraphs the Senator will discover that we have tried to go in some instances beyond the treaties, but this is under the head of "fulfillment of treaty stipulations."

Mr. CONGER. On the question of hose, then, the committee felt bound——

Mr. DAWES. We provide for subsistence and for care of these Crows in addition to the treaty; but under this head, which is for the fulfillment of treaty stipulation, we follow the treaty stipulation, which reads just as this paragraph does.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps that statement relieves the committee from the charge of extravagance in furnishing so many hose to the young people of that Crow Nation.

Mr. DAWES. The committee felt that they were entitled to just the judgment the Senator has rendered.

Mr. CONGER. There could be, I suppose, an expenditure made out of the general fund for some such purpose, though the treaty did not require it out of the moneys belonging to the Indians. I thought it was a good subject to call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which we treat a great Indian nation. Having called attention to the simple provision we make for these young children that we propose to civilize and dress in American fashion, and heard an explanation of the Senator, I know how anxious he will be to have another pair of hose distributed around.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will observe that this is the seventeenth time we have done this in the same way in fulfillment of this obligation, and I hope we shall continue to the end of the treaty.

Mr. CONGER. This is the seventeenth time the Senator has had charge of the bill without discovering that a little more was necessary.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Crows, in section 1, line 327, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy" and insert "sixty;" and in line 328, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the clause read:

FISHING RIGHT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived while the Senate was in executive session, the Chair deems it his duty now to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, or rather the first special order, which is——

Mr. BLAIR. There is no unfinished business on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that it is a special order, and not unfinished business. The first special order on the Calendar is——

Mr. BLAIR. The end of the morning business having been reached, I move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 347, Senate bill 1886, to grant pensions to honorably discharged soldiers after six months' service, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair deems it his duty to lay before the Senate the first special order on the Calendar, and the Chair orders the Chief Clerk to report it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution reported by Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that that may be laid aside and the Indian appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the special order be informally laid aside and the Indian appropriation bill proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The reading of the bill will be continued.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts that I may offer a four-line resolution for immediate consideration. I suppose, however, it will be objected to. If nobody else shall object to it, I will myself, because it would not be in good faith to the Senator from Massachusetts to consume time now; but I want to get it in a situation where I may call it up in the morning hour to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the resolution of the Senator from Virginia at this time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read for information.

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the resolution, and the Chair will then recognize the Senator from New Hampshire.

OPEN SESSIONS.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, as follows:

Resolved, That all matters other than those relating to treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in open session.

Mr. DAWES. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this resolution——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The resolution is objected to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution, being objected to, goes over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to make an inquiry in reference to the special order which by direction of the Chair has been placed in the position of unfinished business of the Senate. There is no unfinished business of the Senate, on the Calendar at least. Among the special orders the first one is the resolution relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain, made a special order after the morning business April 9, 1886.

Now I have always understood that there was no unfinished business in the morning hour, and that when an order is considered in the morning hour and is not completed its consideration as a matter of right falls, and it can not be taken up again in the morning hour unless by unanimous consent of the Senate or by a vote of the Senate. But, however that may be, that is not the question which arises now under the ruling of the Chair. The morning hour has elapsed and the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. There was no unfinished business, and on opening the doors of the executive session at about a quarter to 3 o'clock, there being no unfinished business, I made the motion that the pension bill be taken up by the Senate, whereupon the Chair ruled and insisted upon placing the special order before the Senate and in the position necessarily of unfinished business.

I do not know but that it is right, but I am conscious that upon various previous occasions during the present session our presiding officers have, as I understand, ruled to the contrary. I only wish to ask the attention of the Chair to the point, and I will submit to whatever opinion he may express on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In answer to the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire the Chair directs the Chief Clerk to read part of Rule X of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE X.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

1. Any subject may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the time so fixed for its consideration arrives, the presiding officer shall lay it before the Senate unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day; and if it is not finally disposed of on that day, it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders, in the order of time at which it was made special, unless it shall become by adjournment the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. That has not become by adjournment the unfinished business. There is nothing that indicates that it stands in any such relation as that rule contemplates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from New Hampshire that it is the first special order on the Calendar. The Chair holds that it was the duty of the Chair to lay it before the Senate at 2 o'clock, it being the special order for the time, not as unfinished business, but as the first special order on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It not having been displaced by any vote of the Senate hitherto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It not having been displaced by any vote of the Senate. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived while the Senate was in executive session, the Chair held that it was the duty of the Chair to lay it before the Senate the first moment after the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I understand it has been displaced by the bill in charge of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unquestionably, by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I move to proceed to take up the pension bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent of the Senate the Senate has agreed to proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, informally laying aside the special order, which now is the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I understand the Chair to hold that the appropriation bill is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not care to antagonize that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

VETERANS' PROCESSION.

Mr. CONGER. The veterans of the last war have a large procession to-day, which is passing around the Capitol, and has now reached the front of the Capitol building and are about passing by the Senate. The newspapers announced that they would be reviewed by the Senate and House of Representatives before they go to be reviewed by the President. That the members of the Senate may go out upon the steps and see the procession and do honor to the veterans, I move that a recess be taken for twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate took a recess for twenty minutes. At the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The twenty minutes' recess having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. Mr. CONGER. Does it include all who are upon the Sisseton reservation?

Mr. DAWES. No, only one of the several branches.

Removal and settlement of the Upper and Middle bands of the Spokane Indians on the Colville reservation, Washington Territory, $6,000.

And to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the several tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for such modification of existing treaties with said Indians and such change of their reservations as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, and as to what sum shall be a just and equitable liquidation of all claims which any of said tribes now have upon the Government; and also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with the various bands or tribes of Indians in Northern Montana and at Fort Berthold, in Dakota, for a reduction of their respective reservations, or for removal therefrom to other reservations; and also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with the Upper and Middle bands of Spokane Indians and Pend d'Oreilles Indians, in Washington Territory, for their removal to the Colville or Cœur d'Alene reservations, with the consent of the Indians on said reservations, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available; but no agreement made shall take effect until ratified by Congress.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend the amendment, in line 1047, by inserting, after "Washington," the words "and Idaho," and striking out "Territory" and inserting "Territories;" in line 1048, after the word "Colville," to insert "Jocko;" in line 1049, after the word "reservations," to insert:

And also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with said Indians for the cession of their lands to the United States; and also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with the Cœur d'Alene Indians for the accession of their lands outside the limits of the present Cœur d'Alene reservation to the United States.

And in line 1049 to strike out "ten," before the word "thousand," and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

And also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with the Upper and Middle bands of Spokane Indians and Pend d'Oreilles Indians in Washington and Idaho Territories for their removal to the Colville, Jocko, or Cœur d'Alene reservations, with the consent of the Indians on said reservations; and also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with said Indians for the cession of their lands to the United States; and also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with the Cœur d'Alene Indians for the accession of their lands outside the limits of the present Cœur d'Alene reservation to the United States, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, after line 1052, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Delaware Indians the value of twenty-three sections of land provided for by article 14 of the treaty of July 4, 1866, with said Indians, and to fully discharge the obligations of the United States under said article 14 of said treaty, $14,720; said sum to be expended for the benefit of said Delaware Indians in such manner and for such purposes as the Secretary of the Interior may deem to be for the best interests of said tribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 1062, to insert:

Indian-depredation claims: For continuing the investigation and examination of certain Indian-depredation claims originally authorized, and in the manner therein provided for, by the Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1885, $10,000; and the examination and report shall include claims, if any, barred by statute, such fact to be stated in the report; and all claims whose examination shall be completed by January 1, 1887, shall then be reported to Congress, with the opinions and conclusions of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior upon all material facts, and all the evidence and papers pertaining thereto.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty," so as to make the appropriation $20,000.

This letter of the Secretary of the Interior was not before the committee when the bill was reported.

Letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, with estimates of appropriations for investigating Indian depredations.

In this it is estimated that $20,000 is necessary.

Mr. DAWES. Let that be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the whole letter be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be so inserted if there is no objection.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 8, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of letter of the Secretary of the Interior, of the 6th instant, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $20,000, to complete the investigation of Indian depredation claims as required by the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Statutes, 376).

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 6, 1886.

SIR: In accordance with the provisions of section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884 (23 Statutes, 254), I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a letter of 2d instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, inclosing an item of appropriation intended as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill now before the Senate for consideration, in the sum of $20,000, required to enable the Department to complete the investigation of Indian depredation claims, as required by the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Statutes, 376).

The matter has the approval of this Department.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

H. L. MULDROW, Acting Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 2, 1886.

SIR: I have to advise you that in order to enable this Department to complete the investigation of Indian depredation claims, as required by the act approved March 3, 1885 (Stat. 23, p. 376), an additional appropriation will be required to meet the necessary expenses connected therewith.

With this end in view, I inclose herewith a proposed amendment to the Indian appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, now before the Senate for consideration, making an appropriation of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for said purpose, with the recommendation that it receive your approval and be forwarded to the Senate through the proper channel.

The present appropriation for the object specified will be exhausted by June 30 next.

Very respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Proposed amendment to the bill making appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

This amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to continue the investigation of certain Indian depredations claims, in the manner prescribed, and in accordance with the provision of law found in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1885," $20,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations "for support of schools," in section 1, after the words "provided for," at the end of line 1079, to insert "$675,000;" so as to read:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, $675,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, before the word "construction," in line 1081 of section 1, to strike out "purchase;" and after the word "buildings," in the same line, to insert "$40,000;" so as to read:

For the construction and repair of school buildings, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1083, after the word "schools," to insert "$25,000; in all;" and in line 1084, after the word "hundred," to insert "and forty;" so as to read:

And for purchase of horses, cattle, and sheep, goats, and swine for schools, $25,000; in all, $740,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1090, after the word "Indian," to strike out "school" and insert "schools;" so as to read:

And provided further, That the school year of the Indian schools herein appropriated for shall be held to include all usual and necessary vacations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1096, before the word "year," to insert "fiscal;" so as to read:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall report annually, on or before the first Monday of December of each year, in what manner and for what purposes the general education fund for the preceding fiscal year has been expended; and said report shall embrace the number and kind of schoolhouses erected, and their cost, as well as cost of repairs, names of every teacher employed, and compensation allowed, the location of each school, and the average attendance at each school.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1101, after the word "school," to strike out the following clause:

Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars of which shall be expended for the support and education of one hundred and fifty Indian pupils at the Saint Ignatius industrial boarding-school, on the Jacko reservation, in Montana Territory, at $150 each per year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In line 1111 there is a typographical error. The word "tribunal" should be "tribal;" so as to read:

Standing in that relation to them by their tribal laws respectively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made unless there be objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 1113, after the word "each," to insert "$30,625;" in line 1117, after "Arkansas City," to insert "$2,000;" and in line 1118, after the word "school," to insert "$1,500; in all;" so as to make the clause read:

For support of pupils, at $175 per annum each, $30,625; purchase of material erection of shops and necessary outbuildings, and for repairing of same, at Chilocco industrial school, Chilocco, Indian Territory (formerly Arkansas City), $2,000; and for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500; in all, $34,125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Chief Clerk read the clause beginning in line 1121, as follows:

For support and education of Indian pupils of both sexes at industrial schools in Alaska, $15,000.

Mr. CONGER. The appropriation last year for that purpose was $25,000.

Mr. DAWES. Twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. CONGER. I thought it was $25,000. There is a necessity for a larger appropriation even than during the last year for this present year and perhaps for some little time to come. Until there is some organized government arrangement in regard to schools there, I think we should give at least the amount appropriated during the last year. I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty," in line 1122; so as to read:

For support and education of Indian pupils of both sexes at industrial schools in Alaska, $20,000.

Mr. DAWES. The amount appropriated last year was $20,000; the Department has estimated $15,000 for the coming year; and the House gave $15,000, and we thought, under the peculiar circumstances of the condition of things in Alaska at this moment we could hardly be called upon to increase that sum. Everybody knows that there is an unfortunate condition of affairs in respect to schools in Alaska, and that was the consideration which led the committee on the part of the Senate to leave this item as the Interior Department proposed it. It is impossible until there be a reorganization of schools in Alaska to accomplish very much there. The present order of things is such that this sum of money is as good as $50,000, in my opinion, in Alaska. I wish it were otherwise, and I should heartily join with the Senator from Michigan in making it $50,000 if the Department were able at this moment to expend this sum of money judiciously and effectively; but there are circumstances there, which I suppose the Senator is not ignorant of, which were laid before the Senate in a report not long since, that renders it wise not to push the matter further than is suggested here until there be some further examination and some plan matured by which schools in Alaska can be rendred serviceable. This is more to keep Alaska in mind and to keep that people aware of the fact than for anything else. I think it is better to let it be as it is.

Mr. CONGER. Whatever the unfortunate condition may have been in Alaska heretofore, and perhaps to some extent continued up to the present time, this is an appropriation for next year, and by that time I think we have reason to expect, or have a right to hope at all events and I think reason to expect, that the appointments in Alaska and the management of the educational interests there, as well as some other very important interests, will be so changed and modified that we may expect great benefit from this appropriation. It is true that heretofore the appropriation was partially expended in one of three places where it was intended to be expended, and, in consequence of some inability of the officials to fill other places, they were left almost entirely destitute, and their schools, which were doing great service and were valuable to the people of that Territory, have lingered along until perhaps this spring they are required again to sue for an appropriation.

This appropriation is a mere pittance to these only means of education in all that Territory. There is no power by which any taxes can be laid, and there are no public means to support the schools, the only educational facilities in that whole Territory being those which are carried on by denominations of religious people or by charity. There is nothing else to educate either the Indian or the children of white citizens, who are increasing in that Territory more than heretofore.

I had hoped that for the next year an appropriation somewhat commensurate with the vital importance of educating and civilizing the Indians in that Territory would be made with better officers to administer government there—I do not know that it needs any better officers to administer this fund; I believe not from what I have heard about it, though there is a difference of opinion in that respect—I do very much desire that the appropriation shall at least be as great as it was last year, for that was a mere pittance to each of these schools.

The Government of the United States does not want to throw the work of education in that distant Territory entirely upon missionaries and upon charitable contributions of the people of the United States, and that is what it is doing now.

I shall not detain the Senate now to read communications which I have received upon this subject, and which the Senator has received to some extent perhaps, but he knows and I know and every man who cares for the present and the future of education and civilization in Alaska knows how valuable it is at the very commencement of settlements there to bring into the schools not only the Indian children but the children of the miners who are flocking to that country and settling there with their families to a great extent in several places and give them some educational advantages.

The difference of $5,000 to give tone and character to the people of a new far-off Territory is a mere pittance. Money is thrown away in this bill by thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars upon wild, wandering Indians, to whom it may or may not do good. These are a settled people. The whites who have gone to Alaska are settled at a few points, and the description of the necessity for instruction and education among those new settlers there appeals to the sympathy and to the conscience of every legislator to afford some means for carrying on the common ordinary school education which other parts of the country enjoy.

Mr. DAWES. The force of the Senator's remarks no one can doubt, and no one will yield to them quicker than myself so far as they apply; but schools are already in Alaska for those who go there. This has nothing to do with them; and no matter how many white people go there, that has no reference to the question of Indian education. The question is whether we have any means by which we can make $20,000 efficient among the Indians there. If I thought we had, I would not say a word, and I am not going to say a word against it now, because if $15,000 can be used I have no doubt $20,000 can be; but my idea is that the $15,000, like the money of last year, will accomplish very little good among the Indians until the time shall come when a system and a method altogether different from that we have pursued within those borders can be matured and adopted.

The Senator in speaking as he does about the needs of the white people and the Indians there forgets that the Senate has done its whole duty in that respect in passing an education bill which provides for education in Alaska as in other places where it is needed, and the Senate has great encouragement to believe that will soon become a law; and whatever is needed beyond that small sum, which I admit is a small sum, in this bill will be supplemented and enlarged with great beneficial effects by the bill which the Senate has passed and relieved itself of responsibility for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts on what authority he states that the money that was appropriated last year for industrial education in Alaska was not well applied or did not produce good results in Alaska.

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to say it was misapplied, only that as far as it went it did not produce good results; it failed to accomplish all that was hoped for. I get this information from the Department as the reason furnished to the committee why the appropriation asked for this year by the Department itself is $5,000 less than the sum appropriated last year.

Mr. DOLPH. I have not read the communication of the Secretary of the Interior. I was in Alaska last July, and I heard something about the unfortunate difference between the superintendent of industrial schools in Alaska—I do not know just what his title is—the agent of the Secretary of the Interior, and the local authorities at Sitka. I understand that that grew out of an attempt of the superintendent to locate a mission of 640 acres at the industrial school at Sitka and to locate it in such a manner that it embraced improvements made by citizens and part of the cemetery there. That, however, was a mere controversy between a single man, an agent of the Interior Department, and the local authorities. I do not profess to know what the merits of the controversy were. It is a matter very easily remedied.

If Rev. Sheldon Jackson is not a fit man to have charge of these schools, the Secretary of the Interior had it in his power to remove him at any time and appoint another agent to expend the money. If it is objected that the money was expended through the school established by the Presbyterian Board of Missions and supported by private donations, the precedent for that is not wanting, as we have in this very bill on the next page an appropriation of some $22,500 for the support of one hundred and fifty Indian pupils at Saint Ignatius mission school on the Jocko reservation in Montana Territory.

I discussed this question of education in Alaska to some extent during the discussion of the educational bill, and I attempted to show then the necessity for the expenditure of money for industrial education in Alaska through these established schools; but there is an independent school at Fort Wrangel, under the charge of Mrs. Young, the wife of Rev. S. Hall Young, where this entire appropriation might be applied economically and with good results if there is any objection to expending it at the Sitka school. But I do not believe that the money which was expended under the contract with that Sitka school was misappropriated or failed of good results. I have visited some one or two Indian industrial schools in my time; I have visited several times the Indian industrial school formerly located at Forest Grove and located now near Salem in Oregon; I have read something of the operations of other schools; and I say I visited Sitka and visited this industrial school at Sitka, and I venture to assert that there was not last year any money expended in any State or Territory of this Union that produced better results than that very money expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior at the Sitka school. I was surprised at what I saw.

As I now recollect, there was $13,000 appropriated last year for day schools in Alaska and $20,000 for industrial education. In Southern Alaska there are about seven thousand natives and about from two thousand to two thousand five hundred Indian children from four years to twenty years of age. The appropriations made last year, together with the donations which are made by private parties for the support of schools in Alaska, furnished school facilities for five hundred out of the two thousand native children of school age in Southern Alaska. Now it is proposed by this bill to cut down the appropriation of last year with this large population accessible to the schools and whom we propose to educate. Upon what ground we propose to cut down the appropriation I can not see the reason for. If Mr. Jackson is not the right man there, the remedy is in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. He can very easily substitute another man in his place. But while Mr. Jackson may have made a mistake in regard to the location he attempted to make of the lands which were granted to the mission under the act creating a district government for the Territory, I am satisfied that he is doing good work so far as the educational interests of the Territory are concerned.

I am in favor of the amendment and hope it will be adopted; but before I take my seat I should like to inquire whether the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs can inform me whether at the last session provision for day schools was made in this bill or not?

Mr. DAWES. If I remember aright, it was made in the bill that extended a government over Alaska.

Mr. DOLPH. That was passed two years ago.

Mr. DAWES. The $20,000 was all that was appropriated in the Indian appropriation bill last year. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that his amendment will be in order after we get through the amendments of the committee, as the committee's amendments are to be first considered.

Mr. CONGER. This is the only amendment I propose to offer, and I think there will be no objection to it here.

Mr. DAWES. I shall make no objection on the ground of order.

Mr. DOLPH. I would like to inquire if it is proposed to make any provision for day schools in Alaska. The machinery is all there, the teachers are on the ground, and the schools have been established.

Mr. DAWES. The last Indian appropriation bill only appropriated the $20,000 about which we have been talking. The other $15,000 must have been appropriated the year before in the bill which extended a government over Alaska.

Mr. DOLPH. Is this not the proper bill on which to make provision for the day schools that have been established?

Mr. DAWES. The bill organizing a government over Alaska had $25,000 in it for school purposes; then the Indian appropriation bill added $15,000; then last year the Indian appropriation bill had $20,000, and this year it is recommended that it be $15,000. All this comes from what I have stated—the lack in the Department of a confidence in the mode of expenditure.

Mr. DOLPH. But the Senator has not answered my question. I suppose the Committee on Indian Affairs has this matter of the education of Indian children in Alaska in charge. Last year there was an appropriation for industrial education, and I think there was an additional appropriation made last year for the support of day schools in Alaska. Teachers have been sent there from the East, and the schools have been established and are now being conducted and carried on. The question is whether or not the Committee on Indian Affairs propose to make any provision for these day schools, or are they to be suspended?

Mr. DAWES. No other appropriation has come under the cognizance of the Indian Committee or of the Committee on Appropriations for three years except such as I have stated; the first of the three years $15,000, the next $20,000, and the last $15,000. Beyond that in another bill coming from the Committee on Territories was an appropriation at one time of $25,000. So far as my memory serves, that is the entire appropriation for educational purposes in Alaska.

Mr. DOLPH. Is it proposed now by the Committee on Indian Affairs that the day schools which have been established by the Government shall be discontinued?

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Indian Affairs have not been charged with the consideration of that subject. The Committee on Indian Affairs are not charged with the affair of Indian schools. It is the Committee on Appropriations which has reported this bill, and the Committee on Appropriations are now considering that subject.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I understand further that the reason he is there is because he is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and appropriations have to be made for the support of Indian schools. I see on page 45 of this bill appropriations for the support of Indian day and industrial schools. It seems to me that unless it is proposed to discontinue the day schools in Alaska, there ought to be some provision made in this bill for them.

Mr. DAWES. There is a lump sum appropriated for the support of Indian day schools, which sum is distributed among existing schools and new schools, as the Interior Department, under the charge of the superintendent of schools, shall divide it and expend it. Neither the Committee on Indian Affairs nor the Committee on Appropriations assume to say so much money shall be expended at this day school and so much at that day school; but upon all the knowledge they can obtain, added to the estimates from the Department, they recommend an appropriation of as large a sum as they can get any assurance from those who expend it will be profitably and wisely expended. The only limitation upon either of these committees in the Senate so far as I know—the only disposition to stop is at a point where every dollar shall be wisely, economically, and effectively expended.

Mr. DOLPH. Do I understand the Senator that the gross appropriation of $675,000 for schools may be applied to the support of day schools in Alaska?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know why any portion of it that the administrators of this law shall deem wise may not be there expended. What is there in the text of the bill that would prevent it?

Mr. DOLPH. I do not know, except that these Indians have not been provided for in previous Indian appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. If there were day schools there last year, the Senator will solve the problem if he will tell where the money came from. It came from this appropriation last year.

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir; it came from the special appropriation made for education in Alaska.

Mr. DAWES. There was no such appropriation last year.

Mr. DOLPH. It may have been the appropriation of $25,000 made in the act organizing a government for the Territory; but it was a special appropriation nevertheless. If this general appropriation covers it, very well.

Mr. DAWES. This committee are not contending with the Senator from Oregon to keep the money from being expended in Alaska. This committee are as desirous as the Senator perhaps is—he will excuse me for saying so—to have every dollar that can be expended at any point, whether it be Alaska or whether it be Florida, where it can be expended wisely, for the committee believe that a dollar spent in this way is worth more than $10 expended in the support and subsistence of Indians.

Mr. DOLPH. I did not mean to intimate that there was any disposition to crowd Alaska out. I think it would be a public calamity, I think it would be a great mistake, as long as the Government has established these schools and provided teachers and has now a system of day schools there, if such an appropriation was either intentionally omitted or overlooked. As I said before, these schools have been supported by a special appropriation, and there has been no division of any general appropriation heretofore made for the Territory; but if the Senator is satisfied that a portion of this money appropriated in a lump sum for day schools may be applied to Alaska, I have no disposition to urge anything else.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I think we can get along without the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn.

Mr. PLUMB. I have before me the report of the superintendent of schools in Alaska; and he makes no complaint whatever, in fact says nothing at all about the need of an appropriation. The schools in Alaska, for some reason or other, seem to have declined in attendance last year one hundred and thirty-seven scholars.

Mr. CONGER. At what point?

Mr. PLUMB. At two points.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. PLUMB. All the authority I have is the report of Mr. Jackson.

Mr. CONGER. I think there must be a mistake about the figures.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no recommendation for any increased appropriation, and no suggestion that anything is lacking. The year the bill was passed for the organization of Alaska, in that bill there was an appropriation of $25,000 for school purposes. The Senate subsequently put on $25,000 in the Indian appropriation bill, but it was cut down in conference $10,000, leaving the whole amount for that year, two years ago, $40,000. Last year the Department recommended that $20,000 be appropriated for Alaska, and that was given. There was no suggestion then that the amount was scant, and, as I said, the report does not indicate it, neither the report of the person on the ground, nor of the superintendent of Indian schools, nor of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The Department this year recommend $15,000. That is given. On consulting with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and with the gentleman who has the supervision of these schools under this administration, it was found that they were very eager on this subject of education and had recommended, as they stated, all that they thought could be usefully spent, and so we have given to them, as the House has done, all that they have asked to be appropriated in every quarter for this purpose.

While I do not think myself that it is wise to appropriate money which the officials say they can not usefully spend, at the same time I have no objection to adding $5,000 to this item if that will do any good; but there is one thing I think we ought to bear in mind, that lavish appropriations do not generally bring good results. The executive officer charged with the expenditure of this money must necessarily have some system in regard to his expenditure, and if we thrust upon him money which he has no system for spending it is very likely to get out of the Treasury in the way of the employment of persons who perhaps may not be of great advantage to the service; and it is a very idle and at all events an inconsiderate way of acting. Therefore we thought by agreeing upon the main proposition to give everything that would be as far as we knew properly expended for this purpose, it was unwise to heap on the Department additional appropriations. But so far as I am concerned, I have no purpose of opposing the amendment. I do not care for the difference between $15,000 and $20,000. I have not been converted on the main question, but at the same time it is fair to try the experiment, if it is to be tried, in the most thorough way. If the $20,000 will do any more good than the $15,000, I am willing to agree to it.

Mr. CONGER. For some years the different denominations of religious people have in the Indian country, at their own expense and by the contributions of the people at home, established and kept up schools. In Alaska there are seven schools, five of which I think—I am not certain as to the number—have been established for some years. I have in my possession photographs of the building and of the pupils and of the teachers, illustrating the character of the buildings for school houses and the appearance of the pupils, the age and size of the Indian children there.

Now, sir, I venture to say that in the whole bounds of the world there has not been a more faithful and devoted class of missionaries engaged in the civilization of Indians and forming schools than there has been in Alaska; and this Government giving millions of dollars for one purpose and another refuses a little paltry assistance to the Presbyterian missionary board or to the Catholic schools there or to the Methodist schools, and cuts down from last year the meager appropriation of $20,000 to these seven schools, cuts it down this year to $15,000.

I am not going into the question of the contest with some representatives of this Government there who have imprisoned teachers and who have imprisoned the agents of the Government in drunken debauches; men who under the influence of liquor have made their complaints and bound over good Christian men and attacked Christian women in the discharge of their duty. I thank God they have been removed from the positions which they had disgraced too long, and I hope better men are there and will be there to assist good men and good women in preserving whatever there may be of educational advantages to the Indian children and to the other children of Alaska.

Sir, if I had the time to spend about three hours in reading the statements and accounts of the different people who have been engaged there in educating these Indian children, if I had an opportunity to present here the prophetic letters of Mrs. McFarland, a woman whose name will be honored wherever it is known in her efforts to keep up one of these industrial schools, I think there would be no question but what this appropriation would be increased to $20,000, ay to $50,000, and the people of the United States would demand it, sanction it, approve it. But I shall not detain the Senate now. There will come a time when some questions to be discussed in regard to that Territory will be before the Senate, when I shall take the opportunity of presenting in a more direct and logical form some of the things to which I allude now.

Our appropriation is wholly under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. I have no doubt he will see to it that all the means and all the agencies of this Government for properly administering this fund for the beneficent object for which it is granted, will be carried out. I have that faith in this administration; I have that faith in the Secretary of the Interior; I have that faith in any officer who shall be confirmed by the Senate to manage the affairs of Alaska, that all these influences shall be on the side of morality, of civilization, of education, that we may be preparing that far-off Territory to become an honored part of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, after the word "funds," at the end of line 1132, to insert:

For annual allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt, in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1136, to increase the total amount of the appropriation "for support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., and for transportation of Indian pupils to and from said school" from $80,000 to $81,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1143, after the word "all," to strike out "forty thousand" and insert "forty-one thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For support of Indian industrial school at Salem, Oreg.: Two hundred Indian pupils, at $175 per annum each, $35,000; pay of superintendent, $1,500; completion of school building and necessary outbuildings, and repairs and fencing, $5,000; in all, $41,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish to propose the introduction of an amendment at the end of the paragraph beginning at line 1145.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator to wait until we get through with the committee amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; I suppose the amendments of the committee are to be first acted on.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, after line 1159, to insert:

For the completion of buildings and the purchase of additional grounds for the use of the Indian school at Lawrence, Kans., $58,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 1167, to insert:

For support of one hundred and fifty Indian pupils at the Saint Ignatius mission school, on the Jocko reservation, in Montana Territory, at $150 per annum each, $22,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1179, before the word "transportation," to insert the words "collecting and;" and in line 1186, after the word "for," to strike out "the" and insert "their;" so as to make the clause read:

For collecting and transportation of pupils to and from Indian schools, and also for the transportation of Indian pupils from all the Indian schools, and placing of them, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such pupils moral, industrial, and educational training, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, $28,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. At the end of line 1187, I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That $735 of said sum shall be paid to the Good Shepherd industrial school of Denver, Colo., as a reimbursement for expenses heretofore incurred by it in transporting twenty-five Indian girls from Turtle Mountain, Dakota, to said school, there to be educated, under a contract with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 3, line 10, after the word "dollars," to insert:

This provision shall not apply, however, to appropriations herein or heretofore made for construction of ditches or other works for irrigating purposes.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That no purchase of supplies for which appropriations are herein made, exceeding in the aggregate $500 in value at any one time, shall be made without first giving at least three weeks' public notice by advertisement, except in cases of exigency, when, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall make official record of the facts constituting the exigency and shall report the same to Congress at its next session, he may direct that purchases may be made in open market in amount not exceeding $3,000. This provision shall not apply, however, to appropriations herein or heretofore made for construction of ditches or other works for irrigating purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment to come in after line 917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 917 insert:

For the support, education, and civilization of the Seminole and Creek Indians remaining in Florida, $6,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that there is no objection on the part of the members of the committee to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wished to get the information; I did not hear it read before.

Mr. CALL. I will state that under the treaties made by the United States with those Indians they were allowed at various times $20,000, an annuity of $5,000 a year, but those were abrogated by the treaty with the Indians that they should go West, and they have not been receiving the annuity since. Those Indians who remained in Florida have never received it, and they are now in a condition where the appropriation will be eminently useful to them. Six thousand dollars were appropriated at a former Congress, and that sum has been exhausted.

Mr. DAWES. In the Indian appropriation act of 1884 we made an appropriation of $6,000 to enable the Seminole Indians in Florida to obtain homesteads upon the public lands, and establish them thereon. Under that provision a special agent "was assigned the duty of visiting these Indians for the purpose of inducing them to take advantage of the above provision. After much difficulty he succeeded in finding a number of Indians who were willing to take homesteads, many of them having small patches of cultivated land, which they have occupied for years, and to which they desire to obtain title. Upon investigation at the land office, however, it was found that all this land is owned by the State of Florida, or by improvement companies, to whom it has been transferred by the State. No public lands could be found upon which to locate these Indians. Further action under the act was therefore suspended. Correspondence has been had, however, with the governor of Florida, who suggests that the officers of the State, as trustees of the improvement fund, might dispose of certain lands to the United States for the purpose of locating these Indians, as contemplated by Congress. Special report will be made upon this subject."

This I read from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The committee communicated with the Department while they were considering this matter, and received a letter which I shall send to the desk to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 5, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of the 3d instant, asking what has been done under the provision in the Indian appropriation act of July 4, 1884 (23 Statutes, 95), "to enable the Seminole Indians in Florida to obtain homesteads upon the public lands, and to establish themselves thereon," and appropriating $6,000 therefor, I have to state that late Special Agent Beede spent several months of the winter of 1884–'85 among the Indians for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of said act.

He finally succeeded in inducing some of the Indians to consent to take homesteads, but was unable to find any vacant available lands upon which to locate them.

In view of this result, nothing further was done in the matter until quite recently, except that some correspondence was had with Governor Perry, of Florida, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the State or public improvement companies, owning the lands by virtue of grants to the State, would surrender the same so that the Indians might acquire title thereto.

Very respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

THOMAS P. CLEAVES, Esq.,
Clerk Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. Under these circumstances, as negotiations were going on with the governor of Florida to obtain title to the little patches of land where the Indians reside, they not being willing to go off into the everglades and be located there where the Government owns the land, we thought it was best to let them go on with these negotiations and this $6,000, none of which has been expended, and that it was not worth while to make a new appropriation until that was done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the amendment is not within the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not make that point of order without knowing something about the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do know something about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont makes a point of order. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My point of order is that this is an amendment increasing the appropriation, which has not been reported from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. CALL. Of course the point of order will exclude the amendment, and that without a knowledge of the facts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make it for the purpose of taking my friend off his feet. I will reserve it until he is through with his observation.

Mr. CALL. I say that the point of order is made without a knowledge of the facts of the case, and it does great injustice. The committee have no information on the subject. The Interior Department has neglected these Indians entirely. The committee every year enacts a falsehood in plain and unmistakable terms, alleging that these Indians have gone West when they have not gone West. The annuity, which was appropriated and stipulated, of $12,000 a year to be paid to them is paid to the Seminoles in the West under a false allegation that these Indians have gone West. The provision of the treaty is that when the Indians in Florida have gone West that annuity shall be paid. The remaining Indians have never gone West. Year after year this falsehood is re-enacted; year after year I expose it. The Indians are known to be in Florida.

Here is treaty after treaty which I have before me stipulating to pay $20,000 a year. That was abrogated in the treaty for their removal to the West; yet there are three hundred of the Indians in Florida and an abundance of land to place them upon. The statement of the agent that there is no land there for them is ridiculously absurd. The records of the Land Office here show the fact to be as I state it. I have investigated the records, and I have had a map made.

These Indians are there with those treaty stipulations in their favor. The United States has not been able to get their consent to go West. When they are there peaceable, well disposed, capable of being civilized, what reason can be given, when you expend millions upon millions of dollars for the support, education, and civilization of Indians in the West, why these Indians should not have some consideration? They have extinguished their title to the whole of that soil. The title to 37,000,000 acres of land has been given up by them. They have not a foot of land; they have had no care or protection or assistance from the Government, and now when the railroads are there and the whole country is being occupied, is it the part of wisdom, is it not absurd, that these Indians should be left to extremity, that they should be forced into hostility to the white people, destroying their cattle and committing outrages here and there when they are disposed to be civilized, and quiet, and peaceable?

Why should they not have schools? Why should they not have some farmer to instruct them? No man can give a sensible reason for it. It is inhuman; it is wrong; it is in violation of your treaty stipulations. This little $6,000 that I propose to give, as was given two years ago, will be expended at once in putting them upon the soil, the homesteads, the land of the Government which may be given to them. There are over 500,000 acres of public land suitable for settlement by these Indians, and why should they not receive the same consideration that they do elsewhere? I have only asked for $6,000 for its continuance. This is not to be bestowed upon them in charity. It is to be given to them as they locate and improve their little homes, and in order to enable them to be withdrawn from fishing and hunting and devote themselves to agriculture.

No one can give a sensible reason why this appropriation should not be made. The committee can not do so. They have not bestowed any care or attention upon the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order being made——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent before I renew the point of order to say a single word.

If the Committee on Indian Affairs, that we all know has the best possible disposition toward the Indians, has not thought fit to go into this enterprise of appropriating money for Florida Indians, I do not think it would be right for the Senate to do so, even on the very persuasive suggestions of my friend from Florida. I must therefore insist on the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. CHACE. In line 152, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause I propose to amend read:

For the expenses of the commission of citizens, serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I think a point of order lies against that amendment.

Mr. CHACE. Does the Senator from Iowa make the point of order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It increases the appropriation.

Mr. CHACE. I am aware it does; but I was in hopes that the amendment would be allowed to go through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. CHACE. I am aware that my amendment is subject to the point of order; but I hope the Senator will withhold it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We must stick to points of order on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. At the end of line 1148 I move to add:

For reparation of present building and construction of new buildings at Genoa, Nebr., $10,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that subject to a point of order, Mr. President?

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not make the point of order, because, while this does not come formally from the Committee on Indian Affairs, it meets with its approval, as I think the chairman will vouch.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator from Massachusetts say?

Mr. DAWES. I think the item ought to go in the bill, but it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you say that it meets the approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. DAWES. It meets the approval of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not make the point of order, then, as the Senator in charge of the bill says that it meets the approval of the Committee on Appropriations, and that amounts to its being reported from them, though in an informal way.

Mr. DAWES. It meets the approval of the committee in this way: Their attention has been called to it to-day for the first time, but the papers show that it would have been made a part of the estimates but for the fact that certain papers had been mislaid and were not sent up.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to see some estimate from the Department in regard to it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think I can perfectly satisfy the Senator as to the necessity for this expenditure.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Nebraska has the papers which were mislaid.

Mr. MANDERSON. The building which is being used for the purpose of an Indian school at Genoa was what is known as the council-house for the Pawnee Nation, and was situate upon the Pawnee reserve. It was a brick building of large dimensions; but after the Pawnees left their reservation and went to the Indian Territory, it stood for many years without an occupant. Of course the natural result was that the building was very greatly abused. Some repairs were made to the building when it was turned into an Indian school, but not sufficient repairs, however, to make the building either comfortable or healthful for the inmates. There is no system of sewerage, there are no bath-rooms, and the laundry and conveniences of that character are a part of the building.

The letters from the superintendent in charge urge a much greater appropriation than what I propose for the different purposes of the school, but after looking the matter entirely over, for the purpose of building the necessary outside laundry and bath-rooms and repairing the old building and giving it a sewerage system, this amount will I think be ample, notwithstanding the estimates are much greater.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to see something from the Department in regard to it. Has the matter ever been submitted to the Department?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have letters from the superintendent of the school.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why did he not make his report to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MANDERSON. He made his report to the Interior Department, and one of my colleagues in another place visited the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the report brought to me by that colleague is that the papers and estimates could not be found, or they would have been sent to the Indian Affairs Committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. They certainly could have telegraphed, as has been done in other cases, to the committee. We should find out something about it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Probably that would have been done, but the fact did not appear to me until to-day when the bill was under consideration. I thought the matter was here in proper form.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that if the amendment should be adopted, when the bill goes into the conference, unless the Department desire to have this item remain, it can be stricken out. The subcommittee was satisfied of the fact that the mislaying of the papers was the reason why an estimate for this purpose had not been made. It will be brought to the attention of the Department, and if we are mistaken about what we state to the Senate, it will go out in the committee of conference I have no doubt.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not heartily approve of the amendment I shall not urge it on the conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FRYE. The Post-Office appropriation is under consideration in committee. It is important to get an amendment in to-night. I ask leave to present a proposed amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill providing for carrying the foreign mails in American steamships.

Mr. PLUMB. Let the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Said act is hereby amended by striking out lines 80, 81, and 82 and inserting instead thereof the following:

"Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails: For transportation of foreign mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $1,000,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to enter into contract with American built and registered steamships, whenever possible, for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not to exceed 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed $600,000 of the sum hereby apropriated."

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that motion the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The CHIEF CLERK. "Resolution reported by Mr. FRYE from the Committee on Foreign Relations relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 12, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for twenty days, beginning to-morrow, on account of indisposition.

TARIFF REDUCTION.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to make a privileged report. The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to revenue and the collection thereof, and also sundry bills on the same subject, has directed me to report the bill which I send to the desk, together with a report thereon in writing, and also some explanatory tables. I ask that the bill, with the accompanying report with tables of estimates, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. 7652) to reduce tariff taxes and to modify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, including the tables of estimates, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I beg leave to present at this time the views of a minority of the Committee on Ways and Means upon the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the leave requested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] will be granted, and the views of the minority of the committee will be printed with the report of the majority.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Just at this moment I ask unanimous consent to present a protest of leading manufacturers in all the States of this Union, who employ something like forty-seven thousand workingmen, against any reduction of existing tariff duties. I do not ask that anything more than the heading be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] asks unanimous consent to present a protest against the passage of any bill reducing tariff duties, and asks that the heading of the paper be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MORRISON. Let this protest, like others, come in as other petitions and protests do—through the petition-box. That is the rule applicable to all. The minority of the committee has made a protest in the minority report just presented.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, just at this moment of time, the majority and minority reports upon the tariff from the Committee on Ways and Means having been presented, I desire to have unanimous consent to present in open House, instead of through the petition-box as required by the rules, the protest of leading manufacturers from thirty-six States and Territories against any reduction of duties. The signers of this protest employ in their establishments over forty-seven thousand persons. It is the fourth bound volume of protests which has been presented, and the aggregate of all the employés whose employers make the protests is over one hundred and seventy-five thousand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Then let it go into the petition-box.

Mr. DUNHAM. Would it be in order to move that the report of the Committee on Ways and Means be put into the petition-box along with this protest?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would not.

RECESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that the House take a recess to-day from half past 2 o'clock until half past 3, to review the parade of the veterans of 1861.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess to-day from half past 2 until half past 3 o'clock.

Mr. BEACH. I shall object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is not my motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order when the hour proposed for the recess shall arrive.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I give notice that at half past 2 I shall make this motion.

OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. MILLARD. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial signed by seven thousand dairymen and business men of the State of New York, protesting against the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; and I ask that the memorial, without the names, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MORRISON. Let these petitions take the usual course under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] objects.

INVESTIGATION OF LABOR TROUBLES.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Labor, to which was referred a resolution offered by myself proposing an investigation into the unfortunate labor troubles now existing in various States, has made a report on that subject. I submit that, in view of the magnitude and urgency of these troubles, the House ought to consider the subject immediately. I therefore ask that the report of the Committee on Labor be now taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. What is the proposition?

Mr. LAWLER. It is a resolution offered by myself proposing an investigation into the causes of the existing difficulties between employers and employés of railway companies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] asks unanimous consent that the House take up for present consideration a resolution reported from the Committee on Labor proposing, as the Chair remembers, to appoint a committee——

Mr. LAWLER. There was one resolution introduced by myself and another by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

The SPEAKER. Only one question can be considered at a time. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. REAGAN. Let the resolution be read, so that we may know what it is.

The resolution, as introduced by Mr. LAWLER and referred to the Committee on Labor, was read, as follows:

Whereas the recent correspondence between Mr. T. V. Powderly, grand master of the Knights of Labor, composed of mechanics, artisans, and farmers of the United States, and Mr. Jay Gould, president of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, raises issues of vital moment to the tranquillity of the country and the general welfare of the people thereof: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Labor be, and is hereby, directed to investigate into the underlying causes of the differences existing between employers and employés of railway companies and other common carriers, and to that end may send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and compel the attendance of witnesses, and may employ a stenographer, who shall be paid such reasonable compensation as said committee may direct; and the said committee may sit during the sessions of the House, and report what legislation in their opinion is necessary to bring these troubles and differences to satisfactory conclusion. And the sum of $5,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be expended from the contingent fund of the House for the purposes of this investigation, the accounts thereof to be approved by the chairman of the said committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I share fully the anxiety of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] with reference to this investigation, but I beg to suggest to him that the Committee on Rules is now ready to report on this subject; and if there be no objection, that report will now be submitted.

Mr. LAWLER. I would ask the Clerk to read the substitute recommended by the Committee on Labor for this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] object?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to anything, but I wanted to make a suggestion——

Mr. REAGAN. Let us hear the resolution of the Committee on Rules; and then, having heard both resolutions, we can act more intelligently.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules, as the Chair understands, is ready to report.

Mr. LAWLER. I merely asked that the substitute of the Committee on Labor be first read, and then the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to reading the report, as requested by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to know whether the report of the Committee on Rules can now be read, subject to objection?

Mr. MORRISON. The report is privileged.

Mr. REAGAN. The report of the Committee on Rules, I take it, is a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. REAGAN. If, therefore, the resolution to which the gentleman from Illinois refers is to be read, I shall reserve the right of objecting until I hear it.

Mr. MORRISON. The resolution to which my colleague [Mr. LAWLER] refers, I am permitted to say, was under consideration by the Committee on Rules, as well as the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], and the committee recommend the adoption of a substitute for both of these resolutions, and to take the place of both. These resolutions have been considered together; and the Committee on Rules has directed me to report the following, which I send to the desk to be read by the Clerk.

Mr. LAWLER. I have no objection to hearing the report of the Committee on Rules read.

Mr. MORRISON. It is a privileged report and not subject to objection.

Mr. LAWLER. And I withdraw my request.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The resolution to which the gentleman from Illinois refers is a privileged resolution, under the order made by unanimous consent to allow the Committee on Labor to report such legislation as it saw fit in relation to arbitration.

The SPEAKER. But that was only in relation to arbitration.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. So is this.

The SPEAKER. This is a resolution proposing the appointment of a select committee by the Speaker of the House; and, moreover, the resolution referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER], and reported by the Committee on Labor, was reported during the hour for the call of committees, and under the rule it has gone on the Calendar, losing its place as a privileged report.

Mr. LAWLER. I withdraw my request.

Mr. RANDALL. The report of the committee is a modification in some degree of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] is withdrawn, I understand.

Mr. MORRISON. It was not necessary, as the Committee on Rules presents a privileged report, which I now ask shall be read.

The SPEAKER. The report of the Committee on Rules will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred a House resolution proposing to create a select committee of five members to investigate the disturbed condition of the relations now existing between the railroad companies engaged in carrying on interstate commerce and their employés, has had the same under consideration, and reports herewith a substitute for the said resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of seven members, be appointed by the Speaker, to investigate the cause and extent of the disturbed condition now existing between the railway corporations engaged in carrying on interstate commerce and their employés in the States of Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses under oath, sit during the sessions of the House, and may visit or send a subcommittee to such places in such States as may be necessary in order to facilitate such investigation. It shall report to the House during the present session, with such recommendations as it may deem proper to make; and the expense incurred, not to exceed the sum of $3,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers certified by the chairman and one member of the committee.

In the opinion of the committee the resolution referred to it was too comprehensive in its terms to enable any committee appointed under it to make the proposed investigation and report during the present session of Congress; and, therefore, the substitute proposes to confine the investigation exclusively to the differences existing in the five States of Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas, an investigation which it is believed can be made within a reasonable time and at reasonable expense to the Government.

The substitute also proposes to authorize the committee to visit or send a subcommittee to any of the States named, if it shall be considered necessary to do so, in order to facilitate the investigation. It is proposed that the expense shall not exceed the sum of $3,000, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

In case said committee shall visit or send a subcommittee to any of the States aforesaid, the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to advance to the chairman such sum as may be necessary to defray the expenses of such visit, not to exceed $1,000 at any one time, and not to exceed in the aggregate the said sum of $3,000.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution reported.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for a second if it is proposed to pass this under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. It is not proposed to suspend the rules, and this motion does not require a second. It is a report from the Committee on Rules, a privileged report, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] demands the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will not demand the previous question, at least for a few moments. This is too grave a question to be passed without some consideration and debate.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to move the previous question. I will suggest to the gentleman from Texas that there will be thirty minutes for debate afterward, and of this thirty minutes he will have control of fifteen.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRISON. I trust this will be satisfactory.

Mr. LAWLER. I wish to say that I am in accord with that report.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen in support of and fifteen in opposition to the report.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois desires to open the discussion.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Texas may proceed; he can occupy his fifteen minutes now. If in what he may say he makes it necessary for a reply from the members of the committee it will be made.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker it would be fair for the supporters of this resolution to present the reasons for its passage. It is rather an unusual procedure for those who have the negative of a proposition to be required to make the opening and be answered by those holding the affirmative. Such a thing is unknown to parliamentary usage or to legal proceedings.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose to discuss or debate the resolution reported. I believed, and it was the opinion of the Committee on Rules, that the resolution and report, plain and intelligible, would speak for themselves. The gentleman from Texas certainly is not and can not be ignorant of the causes which bring this resolution here or which moved the committee to bring it here. He does not forget that within the last few days a bill was passed by this House which was intended to secure arbitration and amicable adjustment of the grievous ills growing out of the misunderstandings and disputes between railroad workingmen and railroad owners or operators. When that bill was under discussion it was conceded by all that the bill was probably inadequate and might fall short of accomplishing all that was greatly needed. It was claimed and insisted on in the debate that we were in danger of doing harm to those we most desired to benefit—that if the proposed law had any effect at all it might be used to further oppress the weak, or that it was a precedent for, or the beginning of, legislation which would or might add to and help along the very grievances of which laboring men complain, yet nobody had any proposition or amendment to offer which seemed better suited to the purpose, at least none which the House considered better.

Several propositions were presented and considered by the Committee on Rules. That committee has reported this resolution with a view to ascertaining the facts out of which these much-to-be-deplored troubles have come to afflict not only those immediately connected with them, but the whole people. The object and purpose of what is here submitted is to get at the facts, to ascertain the truth for our own future guidance and that it may be known by all. That is the whole purpose of this resolution or report which I have submitted.

When we know the truth and are in possession of the facts we may do something toward perfecting the legislation which we have attempted and which to us is new. It can not do harm and may do great good to turn on the lights. The mere knowledge of the truth cures more ills than all the laws of Congress, and we must first know the facts before we can know either our duty or our authority to legislate.

Mr. REAGAN. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the circumstances which give rise to this resolution have attracted very general attention throughout the country and that people seem habitually to look to the Congress of the United States for the control of this question, assuming that its importance makes it a national question. But what I desire to ask attention to is the question—does the Constitution of the United States embrace this as a question for our consideration?

We are told by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that the bill which was passed a few days ago was not regarded as sufficient to cover the necessities of the case; that it was thought well to supplement it by some other action of the House; and that no one had offered any better proposition than the one which was adopted. Well, sir, I did not offer for affirmative action by Congress a better proposition; but I did, and those who heard me will remember it, offer a better, a truer, and a constitutional solution of this difficulty, not by Congress, but by the authorities of the States, which under the Constitution have the control of local matters.

It is assumed, I see, in the resolution, as is implied in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois, that because the railroads of the country may carry interstate commerce, therefore the Congress of the United States has power to regulate contracts for labor between the railroad companies and their employés. I endeavored to demonstrate on a former occasion, when the bill referred to was up, that Congress had no more power to regulate the disposition of questions arising between common carriers and their hired laborers than it has to provide for the litigation of controversies between those engaged in interstate commerce and those from whom they buy their groceries, their dry goods, their horses, their lands, or anything else.

These are local matters, and the fact that one of the parties to the controversy may be engaged in interstate commerce does not give jurisdiction over another party or over a subject-matter not coming within the purview of the Constitution of the United States. It is for this reason and on this account that Congress has no jurisdiction over this subject, growing out of the clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce among the States. I believe and aver that there is not a judge in the United States of respectability or a respectable lawyer in the United States that will assume that because one of these parties may be engaged in interstate commerce that gives Federal jurisdiction over all of their transactions with everybody else.

Why, sir, a large part of the business of these common carriers is the carrying of the commerce wholly within the States. Part of it is interstate commerce. This resolution would embrace all carriers, whether of State or interstate commerce. In addition to the fact that it can not be embraced within the clause of the Constitution relating to the regulation of commerce between States, I assume and aver that it is not embraced within the first section of the third article of the Constitution, which describes the sort of courts and tribunals that can be created under the Constitution. I affirm and aver that it can not be embraced under the second section of the third article of the Constitution, which prescribes the various subject-matters over which the Constitution gives jurisdiction to the Federal courts.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. REAGAN. My time is very limited.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that the condition of affairs——

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman please ask his question? I can not give way for a speech.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That the condition of affairs borders on revolution. The Government would have the right on proper application——

Mr. REAGAN. I see the gentleman's point and will answer it. If disturbances arise too great to be controlled by the States they can call for the aid of the Federal Government. It is assumed that this is a condition of affairs bordering on revolution. The Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence assumed the capacity of the American people for self-government. The Constitution assumed to distribute and partition the powers of the Government on the idea of the capacity of the people for self-government. It delegated certain powers to the Federal Government. It reserved other powers and all the powers relating to local legislation to the State governments. These questions which relate to the employment of laborers and local contracts belong to the State authority; and when Congress passes this resolution, as I suppose it will do, or anything else that violates the Constitution [laughter], it assumes the incapacity of the people for self-government; it assumes that the people of the States of this country are no longer able to preserve order, although they have Legislatures and governors, judges and ministerial officers, and all the means of preserving order, enforcing local and domestic rights, protecting life, person, and property, and preserving the peace of society. It seems to me, and I wish the members of this House could realize it, that repeatedly of late the House has taken such action as substantially violates all of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States except it may be the preamble and the general-welfare clause. And it seems to me that we are very impatient to get rid of the preamble and the general-welfare clause. [Laughter.] The simple question now to be decided by this House is whether it will deny and repudiate the capacity of the people of this country for self-government under the Constitution and the laws—whether we are to assume that the States are no longer able to execute their functions, and that the power of Congress may be thus invoked to execute the local laws in the various States.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REAGAN. If it is but a question.

Mr. BURROWS. Just one question. I suppose the gentleman has no doubt of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce?

Mr. REAGAN. I have already treated of that question, Mr. Speaker. I do not doubt that; but the regulation of local contracts for hire is not the regulation of commerce between the States.

Mr. BURROWS. My question is: If Congress has the constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce, has it not the constitutional power to inquire into its partial or total interruption?

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it is no partial interruption of commerce between the States and no total interruption of it that is the question here. As I have already said, because one side or one party in this controversy is engaged in interstate commerce, that fact does not control the question of jurisdiction. It must be the subject-matter that gives jurisdiction to Congress. I see that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] is now present. I do not know whether he heard the report of the Committee on Rules which limits the scope of the resolution introduced by him. His resolution would have been subject to the same objection I am now making to the report of the committee, but it would have had the merit of embracing the action of those eleven men who met in New York city a short time since and by an arbitrary order raised the price of coal 25 cents a ton, but did not raise the price of labor one mill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said substantially all that I desire to say on this subject. Is my time exhausted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes left.

Mr. BURROWS. I did not quite understand the answer of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to my inquiry. My question was this: If, as the gentleman holds, Congress has constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce, why has it not power to inquire into the partial or total interruption of that commerce?

Mr. REAGAN. Questions arise which are of a complicated character. While these railroads are partially engaged in the transportation of commerce between the States, they are also partially engaged in the transportation of commerce wholly within the States. But, I repeat, because one of the parties to the dispute is engaged in a business which is within the jurisdiction of Congress, to wit, interstate commerce, it does not follow at all that Congress has jurisdiction over the matter at issue here. That fact does not give Congress or the Federal Government jurisdiction over local contracts for the hire of labor any more than it gives them jurisdiction over controversies between common carriers and the men from whom they buy goods or groceries or lands. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on this subject. I believe the time has arrived when it is the duty of this House to speak words of wisdom to the men who are now out and who say that they are suffering on account of this labor question. It is the duty of this House to dispel from the minds of the Knights of Labor the delusions that have seized upon them, the chief of those delusions being the idea that relief for them lies in Congress. Relief can not be found here, nor can it be had from any legislative enactment with regard to the wrongs they complain of, and it is the duty of this House now to speak at once, in order that they may pause and consider and see where their action is tending. How do we stand, sir? Mr. Powderly stands at the head of a powerful organization and he has spoken and endeavored to act with wisdom; but he has shown his inability to control the organization, because his subordinates utterly refuse to obey his orders.

They say, "We wish to arbitrate." Should not this House tell them that there is nothing that can be brought forward, from their standpoint, that admits of legal arbitration? What is there to be arbitrated? They say to the railroad companies "We wish employment." The railroad companies reply, "We do not need your services." Then the men say, "We will arbitrate;" and the railroad companies say, "We have nothing to arbitrate; we do not need your services." That is the whole case. Then why not speak to these men now and tell them that this is like the case of every other contract known to the laws of the land, that they are at liberty to say to the railroad companies, "We will work for you," or "We will not work for you," and that the railroad companies are at liberty to say to them, "We will employ you," or "We will not employ you," and that is the end of the transaction. Why should not the Representatives of the people here assembled tell these men, "We have no power and can make no law that will make contracts for you against the will of the parties." Let that be understood. Let these men understand it, and let them understand that they are at liberty either to work or to refuse to work, or to go and take farms and be good citizens. We can give them homesteads out of the public domain; this is all we can do.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in his line of constitutional argument. He is himself among those who have insisted and he still insists upon the constitutionality of Congressional control over the question of interstate commerce. It has been claimed by those whose legal opinions are worth considering, that the power to control or regulate interstate commerce included the right to regulate all the means of carrying on interstate commerce. Without committing myself to that view, I may say that I do insist upon the power and rightful authority in Congress to inquire into the facts, so that we may ascertain and know what legislative power or action may be based on and justified by the facts.

I am quite as mindful as the gentleman from Texas, Judge REAGAN, can be of how we have grown upon the use of constitutional powers once deemed more sacred than now. The great Berrien of Georgia, and maybe greater Marshall of Virginia, in their time never could have found constitutional authority for meddling with or taking hold of our common schools; but we have now here estimable men and good lawyers from those States who have no difficulty in finding this power which was entirely overlooked in the time of Berrien and Marshall. Houston, Rusk, and the men of their time, found constitutional power to annex and tie on a great State; but they could hardly have been aware of the constitutional power to annex or tie together distant seas by a railroad below the moon but not between it and our own country. We investigate to ascertain scientific facts, currents of the sea and the like, and we may certainly inquire into the causes of contention and turmoil which threaten the well-being of a whole people.

I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any member of this House more desirous of restricting legislation within constitutional limits than I am. But in this case I find that we are called upon to deal in part with a matter which concerns governmental roads; that is, railroads in aid of which Government has given land and money, and where the Government has an interest in seeing peace and order prevail instead of discontent and disorder. Nay, more; the very language of this resolution shows that in addition the proposed inquiry is to be instituted in regard to interstate commerce, which is interrupted. There is no harm whatever in this House possessing itself of full information in relation to these matters. The Federal Executive may be called upon to interpose by the governors of the States within whose territory these disturbances exist, and when so called upon may transmit the request to Congress. Therefore I think we ought to know exactly the causes of and the facts connected with these troubles, and for these reasons I have assented to the proposition as submitted. We can not refuse this investigation. A man might just as well stop when his house is on fire to inquire whether he has legal authority to arrest the incendiary instead of pouring on water to stop the conflagration.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, in that brief time I can only say this: Seven hundred thousand men have exercised their right to petition this honorable body for this investigation, and, sir, I, for one, am anxious to give it to them, and very curious to see how many gentlemen on the other side of the House will invoke the Constitution by the same arguments employed by them and their predecessors twenty-five, thirty, forty, or fifty years ago against the right of petition. Yes, I am curious to see how many there are who will record themselves by their votes against the demand of these seven hundred thousand men that have come with their wrongs and ask for sympathy, assistance, and redress from the Congress of the United States—how many gentlemen there are here who will say to these petitioners: "We turn you away; and your petition is denied."

Mr. REAGAN. Upon what authority does the gentleman state that seven hundred thousand men have asked for this?

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman will give me time I will make it very plain to him that that number, and more than that number, are demanding this action on the part of the House of Representatives. That fact has been fully recognized by the committee that have unanimously reported this resolution to the House.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to another member of the committee, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED, of Maine. This matter is a very simple one. The Congress of the United States, like every legislative body, sits for the hearing and the redress of grievances. Even if it be true, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN] says, that we have nothing to say to these men after the investigation is over, we certainly are bound to give them the investigation. We are bound to hear what the facts are, and, if we can, to act upon them. We must hear before we can give anybody even good advice. If it turns out that the facts are such that they can not be acted upon within the purview of the Constitution, then there will be time for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to repeat his constitutional discourse. But, for my part, I beg leave here and now—and there can be no better opportunity than in a time of trouble like this, when there seems to be great disturbances in the land—to protest against this everlasting putting up of the Constitution of the United States against every propesition which is presented in this House. I say that the total effect of such action will be to make a mockery of the Constitution and to give point to that jest which was made here long years ago, that the Constitution of the United States, in the mind of a strict constructionist, was in favor of every bill that he wanted and against every bill that he opposed. And the reason why the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] could not answer the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was because he was acting on the principle of the old jest without knowing it. Mr. Speaker, let us give the investigation that is demanded.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I yield two minutes to Mr. WARNER, of Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. What legislation can we enact upon this subject?

Mr. HISCOCK. When the committee makes its report we will see what legislation can be had.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, three questions arise in connection with this resolution: First, is the occasion one of sufficient importance to warrant an investigation? Second, is there any other power competent to make the investigation? Third, is it within the scope of the Constitution for Congress to enter upon it?

That the occasion is one of great gravity every one will admit. That there is no other power adequate to inquire into the existing disturbance or to provide a remedy will I think also be admitted. Commerce among the States is interrupted. The resolution proposes to inquire into the cause of that interruption, and possibly to suggest a remedy. It is, in my opinion, within the scope of the Constitution, under the clause providing for the regulation of interstate commerce. Under that clause the Congress of the United States has power, and it alone has power, to legislate where more States than one are concerned. In this case many States are involved, and the power does not lie with either of them to make an inquiry covering the whole field or to apply an adequate remedy, if a remedy is found to be necessary. I am therefore in favor of the proposed investigation. This is all I desire to say.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, long before our Constitution was adopted there was a grand sentiment prevailing among all the people that every man should be guaranteed the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, for the right of protection in these respects is above the Constitution. Under that sublime sentiment of the fathers of our country, the apostles of liberty, our Constitution was formed.

My resolution, sir, only proposes to investigate the cause of the present unrest among the people of this country. If corporations have violated the right of property or liberty belonging to the humblest man in this country he has a right to redress, which this august assembly should not deny. If the workingmen have been wronged, let us understand it, and let us lay the strong hand of this great Government upon those who have wronged them; let us redress their wrongs, and insure to them "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Powderly, which I will print in my remarks by consent of the House. [Cries of "Read it!"] He is a typical man. Starting life as a worker in the mines, he educated himself. He conquered those twin tyrants of ardent youth—low birth and iron fortune—and to-day there is not a man on this floor who can express sounder or more conservative sentiments or put them in purer English. He asks me to press this resolution so that the truth may be known; so that if the corporations are right they shall have their remedy by law, and if they have oppressed their employés their honest labor shall be paid and the sacred principle maintained that an honest day's labor shall receive a full day's wage. And if there is not power in this Congress under the Constitution to redress such a wrong, God knows our Constitution is "a rope of sand" and is of no avail for the protection of the people.

Why, Mr. Speaker, many years since, some men among the mountains of Pennsylvania, priest or prophet, happened to pierce the ground, and beneficent nature caused the oil to flow from the earth to meet the necessities of humanity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Speaker strikes on me.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania additional time? His three minutes have expired.

Mr. MORRISON. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes.

Mr. MORRISON. I want but one, the gentleman from Pennsylvania may use the other.

Mr. CURTIN. The production of oil in a previously unproductive portion of my State invited there youth and energy and capital. The hills were made to blossom, towns were built, railroads were constructed, and that portion of Pennsylvania became the most prosperous and wealthy of our Commonwealth, because there was room there for individual enterprise, because there were homes for the workingmen as well as those who employed them. But suddenly there came there a corporation—a mythical corporation, which is said to have its headquarters in Boston, and to have a capital of $100,000,000. It laid the iron hand of despotism upon that region. It said to the citizens, "You can produce oil provided you give it to us; if you attempt to refine oil yourselves we have money and corporate power, and we will freeze you out." And so they did. That corporation now owns that country, controls railroads, and exercises despotic sway. Sir, I lived for four years at the capital of a despotic government; but I never knew in Russia such despotism as that, and if all that is alleged is true the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania should be relieved by the action of this central Government, if it can not be accomplished by the State.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CURTIN. I am very sorry for it. Allow me one word more. I find that my resolution has been emasculated. In its present form it extends only to certain localities. I proposed an examination of this whole question of labor and capital—the rights of corporations and the rights of the people—so that the real truth might be exposed to the American people, and that we might legislate intelligently, and in defense of the laws of the country. The time has come when the representatives of the people will be compelled to legislate wisely and independently.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CURTIN. I will take the liberty of appending to my remarks Mr. Powderly's letter:

SCRANTON, PA., April 8, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Accept my sincere thanks for the kind sentiments expressed in your letter. I am very hopeful of good results from the appointment of the committee to investigate the Southwest trouble. Let its investigation be thorough, careful, and impartial. If the workingmen are to blame in whole or part, let it be made known; if the company is the offender, let it be made known. It is my wish that the committee go to the very bottom, search every nook and cranny where a wrong existed or was perpetrated. It will be for the best interests of the country at large that this investigation be proceeded with at once. The public has a right to know where the blame rests, for it is only by finding out where we are wrong that we can properly guard against wrong a second time.

I have been a little under the weather, but I could not hold up any longer. I am at the desk again and will try to stay here.

With kind wishes, I remain, sincerely and truly, yours,

T. V. POWDERLY.

Hon. ANDREW G. CURTIN, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield one minute to my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] should have placed his opposition to this resolution upon constitutional grounds.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to ask pardon of the House for having given offense to Democrats, including the gentleman from Illinois, as well as to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], by referring to the Constitution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope this interruption will not be taken out of my time. The gentleman from Texas is the last man I would have expected to oppose any proposition which had in view the securing of valuable information for this House upon the subject of interstate commerce.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not yield to the gentleman.

We have as much right to get as much information about the difficulties in these States as we have the right to buy a book on these subjects and put it into the Congressional Library. It is information which I have no doubt will assist the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to perfect his interstate-commerce bill when in that bill he proposes to regulate the rates for carrying these freights; for if that is one of the subjects Congress may consider, we ought to know how much it costs to carry freights and what these strikes have to do with interfering with that carriage.

I hope this resolution will pass unanimously, and we will not set a precedent of quibbling about the Constitution every time the rights of the laboring men are involved in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, is there no time left?

The SPEAKER. The time has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I merely wish to say that the Committee on Rules——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has one minute remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Rules have not, as alleged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], emasculated the resolution. On the contrary, the committee have in their substitute given efficiency to the proposition, increasing the membership of the proposed committee and providing a plan for advancing money to execute the object in view. The only limitation suggested is to confine the inquiry to States wherein the disturbances exist—a field extended enough to require all the time of the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand I have one minute of my time remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have long been familiar with the passion which it excites on the other side of the House, and especially in the person of the gentleman from Maine, to mention in any way the Constitution when it came in the way of exercising the despotic power by a popular majority. The mention of the Constitution seems to operate upon the gentleman from Maine like the flaunting of a red rag before a mad bull. But it is only lately, since the vote upon the educational bill which went through here, and since the passage of the labor bill a few days ago, that I have come to fear he has sufficiently indoctrinated members on this side of the House, and especially the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], as to make it an offense to him to speak of the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Sir, the gentleman from Illinois talks about the regulation of interstate commerce. Is it possible he assumes because men hire a laborer in the State of Illinois, or Missouri, or Kansas, the State of Kansas or Missouri are interested in the question of hiring a laborer in Illinois, or, vice versa, in the other States, or that the Constitution gives the power to us to regulate merely local matters, because some of the parties to them happen to be engaged in business coming under the power of the Constitution?

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired, and the question now recurs on the substitute reported by the committee.

The substitute was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POTOMAC FLATS IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now call up Senate bill No. 335, "An act to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River flats, in the District of Columbia." I ask that the bill and the report be read for the information of the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute, as soon as may be, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, a suit against all persons and corporations who may have or pretend to have any right, title, claim, or interest in any part of the land or water in the District of Columbia within the limits of the city of Washington, or exterior to said limits and in front thereof toward the channel of the Potomac River, and composing any part of the land or water affected by the improvements of the Potomac River or its flats in charge of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of establishing and making clear the right of the United States thereto.

SEC. 2. That the suit mentioned in the preceding section shall be in the nature of a bill in equity, and there shall be made parties defendant thereto all persons and corporations known to set up or assert any claim or right to or in the land or water in said first section mentioned, and against all other persons and corporations who may claim to have any such right, title, or interest. On the filing of said bill, process shall issue and be served, according to the ordinary course of said court, upon all persons and corporations within the jurisdiction of said court; and public notice shall be given, by advertisement in two newspapers published in the city of Washington, for three weeks successively, of the pendency of said suit, and citing all persons and corporations interested in the subject-matter of said suit, or in the land or water in this act mentioned, to appear at a day named in such notice, in said court, to answer the said bill and set forth and maintain any right, title, interest, or claim that any person or corporation may have in the premises; and the court may order such further notice as it shall think fit to any party in interest.

SEC. 3. That the said cause shall then proceed with all practicable expedition to a final determination by said court of all rights drawn in question therein; and the said courts shall have full power and jurisdiction by its decree to determine every question of right, title, interest, or claim arising in the premises, and to vacate, annul, set aside, or confirm any claim of any character arising or set forth in the premises; and its decree shall be final and conclusive upon all persons and corporations parties to the suit, or who shall fail, after public notice as hereinbefore in this act provided, to appear in said court and litigate his, her, or its claim, and they shall be deemed forever barred from setting up or maintaining any right, title, interest, or claim in the premises.

SEC. 4. That if, on the final hearing of said cause, the said supreme court of the District of Columbia shall be of opinion that there exists any right, title, or interest in the land or water in this act mentioned in any person or corporation adverse to the complete and paramount right of the United States, the said court shall forthwith and in a summary way proceed to ascertain the value of any such right, title, interest, or claim, exclusive of the value of any improvement to the property covered by such right, title, or interest made by or under the authority of the United States, and may decree that the just value thereof so ascertained by the court be paid to the person or corporation entitled thereto; whereupon all the right, title, and interest of such person or corporation shall vest in the United States, and the sum so ascertained to be the value of such private right, title, or interest shall be paid out of the Treasury.

SEC. 5. That from the final decree of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and every part thereof, in the premises, an appeal shall be allowed to the United States, and to any other party in the cause complaining of such decree, to the Supreme Court of the United States, which last-mentioned court shall have full power and jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the said matter, and every part thereof, and to make final decree in the premises; and the said cause shall, on motion of the Attorney-General of the United States, be advanced to the earliest practicable hearing.

SEC. 6. That until the final decision of the matter hereinbefore in this act mentioned shall have been had, no moneys appropriated for the improvement of the Potomac River, the establishment of harbor lines in the District of Columbia, and the raising of the flats therein, shall be expended otherwise than upon property in respect of which there is no claim adverse to the title of the United States, or for the improvement of navigation in the said river.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River flats, in the District of Columbia, submit the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia have considered Senate bill 335, "to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River flats in the District of Columbia," and unanimously report the same to the House with the following amendment:

Add at the end of the last section of said bill:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats."

As thus amended they recommend the bill do pass.

The amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

At the end of section 6 add:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats."

Mr. BARBOUR. The amendment reported by the committee was submitted by the engineer in charge of the improvement of the Potomac flats.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to offer an amendment to section 4.

Mr. BARBOUR. I presume the amendment reported by the committee takes precedence.

The SPEAKER. That will first be voted upon.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have another amendment coming from the same source. It is not reported by the committee, but I have been requested to present it. It is, to insert after the word "river," at the end of line 8, section 6, the words "or upon the portions of the flats where in the opinion of the Attorney-General the title is vested in the United States."

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment just read allowing money to be expended on such portions of the flats as the Attorney-General may say belong to the United States should not, in my judgment, be adopted. The House should understand that large appropriations have been made for the improvement of the flats along the Potomac. Four years ago, against the struggle of the House, the Senate inserted in the River and Harbor bill an item of $400,000 for the improvement of these flats. This was done in the face of the fact that a large part of the flats was in litigation and alleged to be private property. We tried here to defeat that proposition, but were unable to do so without giving up the whole bill.

Under the appropriations heretofore made—I do not know how much has been appropriated since the appropriation of $400,000—the work upon the improvement of these flats has been going on. While I am not an engineer, my impression is that, if we may trust to the laws of nature, when this work has once been accomplished according to the plan which contemplates the expenditure of several million dollars, it will then cost the Government, if this city is to be saved, nearly as much money to remove that work as it will have cost to put it down.

According to the old chart there was a channel that came out toward the east bank near Easby's Point and ran down the Washington front; but when the bridge was built, or at some other time, the old east channel of the Potomac from the bridge upward was closed, and thus the water was confined to the channel near the Virginia shore. Now, the water from the hill country above comes very rapidly down to where it strikes tide water at Georgetown; and in case of great freshets the tendency is to bank up the water so as to overflow the lower part of the city, which has sometimes occurred.

In order to avoid the injury resulting from this banking up of the water when the floods pour down from the mountains to tide water, the water should have sufficient means of passing off; and one of these means was the old east channel along the Washington shore, which has now been obstructed. The object of the work now going on is to take up all the flats on the east side of the river, forming the wide basin at the head of tide water—to improve those flats, making a great ornamented park of them. In doing this the channel of the river is necessarily contracted, so that when the work is completed the channel will, in my judgment, be too small to allow the passing off of the flood tides from the mountains; and the embanking of the water will cause it to overflow not only the park which it is proposed to make, but the lower parts of the city. This, I think, will be the inevitable effect; but as it is proposed to spend several millions of dollars in Washington city, I presume that is a sufficient answer to all I can say.

I know engineers tell us that the present plan is all right; that they are going to deepen the channel; but this work makes a narrow channel in tide water, so that the water as it pours from the mountains can not flow off rapidly enough to avoid the embanking of the water and the consequent overflow. Unless engineers can do better work than the Almighty did when he created the river and its shores, the effect I have described must result.

Now, I suppose an effort will be made when this bill goes to the Senate—it has never been possible to get the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House to appropriate these large sums for the improvement of private property—but when the bill goes to the Senate another amendment will probably be put on providing for expending hundreds of thousands of dollars in the improvement of private property, or property at least to which the Government has not an undisputed title, property that is claimed by other people. A small part of that property, it is now claimed, belongs, in the opinion of the public officers, to the United States. But at the time the original appropriation of $400,000 was made and this work inaugurated it was claimed that the whole belonged to the United States. I think we shall be prudent if we refuse to authorize any further expenditure on these flats, and limit our appropriations to improving the navigation of the river, to which, of course, I have no objection; for I think the channel ought to be deepened up to Georgetown. But we should not adopt any proposition that would authorize the expenditure of money on a small part of these flats, unless we can control the whole of them. I think the whole scheme is wrong. If we attempt to improve a small part of this property we may give value to private property connected with it, but there will be no assurance that that property will ultimately belong to the Government.

Hence it is, I think, Mr. Speaker, we had better not adopt this amendment. Let the work proposed upon those flats stop and cease until the Government has secured a title beyond all question. Common prudence would suggest no further expenditure of public money should be made to carry out the scheme which has been adopted, whether it is good or bad, until the Government knows it will possess an undisputed title to that property.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to know that, in addition to the other accomplishments of my honorable friend from Texas, he possesses those of a hydraulic and civil engineer. But the gentleman has evidently spoken to a different proposition from that now before this House. There is no proposition here now to make appropriation of money for the improvement of these Kidwell flats. It is, on the contrary, a proposition which, in view of the complications about the title of the Government to this improvement of the river along the city front, passed at the last Congress—I say it is a proposition, instead of requiring the expenditure of the money which the gentleman seems to think it actually requires, that there shall be a suspension of all payment of money upon that portion involved in dispute until the question has been wholly and completely disposed of.

Mr. REAGAN. I should be glad to have the amendment read to see whether I am mistaken or not about it.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is the general object of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I am talking about the amendment, not the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. The object of the bill is to stop the application of money upon any ground where the title is in dispute. But in view of the existing contracts, which the engineer in charge thinks of importance—in view of those existing contracts, it is thought best they should not be interfered with or rescinded, but that the contractors should work upon other points where there is no dispute as to the title to the land.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The bill restricts the expenditure to the channel of the stream and for the purpose of navigation. The amendment, I understand, permits expenditure also on such portion of the river front as the Government possesses undisputed title to. Now, the question I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia is this: What proportion of the river front would be included in that amendment?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have a map here which will answer that question. The title to a large portion of it, as I understand, is in question. The dispute about title arises as to the Kidwell bottoms.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The question in my mind is whether any expenditure could be economically or properly made on parts of the river front without extending over the whole of it?

Mr. BARBOUR. If this map be correct, judging from information I have received, it looks as though it would not be.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the reading of the amendment again, in order that we may see whether I was mistaken about it or not.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. REAGAN. I see that I was not mistaken. I approve of the object of the bill, but not of the object of the proviso. The bill itself as read is in my judgment all right, and it ought to be adopted; but the proviso and the amendment in my judgment are all wrong, and ought not to be adopted, and for this reason: Here we are going to expend money on property which does not belong to the United States, or at least property which other people claim. It seems to me we ought to, if necessary, arrest that work, and not allow money to be spent upon it. Then the amendment comes in, and it is just what I understood it to be. It makes provision we may go on expending money on that portion of the flats to which the Attorney-General may believe the title is in the United States. My objection is to the whole of it. We do not want to go on expending money on these flats, to carry out a scheme which involves the necessity of the ownership of the whole flats, until the title of the Government is clear. I think we will make a mistake if we go on spending money on this property, making it more and more valuable, the result of which will be it will cost the Government, if finally adjudicated in favor of private parties, the increased value by all the improvements which have been made upon it. Remember we have already spent some $800,000 or $900,000 on this improvement, and that we will have to pay the private owners, if the title shall be declared to be in their hands, before the Government can get that property.

Mr. BARBOUR. The answer to what the gentleman has said is obvious. There is only trouble about a small part of these reclaimed flats. Here upon the map the whole survey has been laid down. The red lines indicate where there is difficulty about the title. There are large pending contracts for improving those grounds. Those contracts have been made on fair and reasonable terms, and the engineer in charge thinks they could not be duplicated again in the United States.

This amendment is a simple proposition that he shall go on with this work, but that it shall be suspended on all grounds where there is a dispute as to the title, with a view that the contracts may be continued upon other grounds where there is no defect or dispute as to the title. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it is more than a simple proposition, which can scarcely be objected to. If the title, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, the law officer of the Government, is clear, it does seem to me that some consideration should be given to that opinion; and I do not suppose in the exercise of a wise discretion the Attorney-General is going to permit the Government of the United States, under the operation of this provision of the law, to improve other people's property. I think the gentleman from Texas, therefore, is too particular, and that his objection is not in the interest of the Government. The whole object of the bill and the amendment is to prevent the improper application of the money provided.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Virginia that my argument was not intended to express a doubt as to the proper action of the Attorney-General. I was discussing the question upon an entirely different ground.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, there are one or two clauses in this bill to which I think the attention of this House ought to be called. Before doing so, however, I desire briefly to state the facts out of which this proposed legislation grows.

In the river and harbor act of 1882 the first provision for this Potomac River improvement was made. My recollection is that that clause was inserted by the Senate, and the amount appropriated, if I am not mistaken, was $400,000. At that time there was a question as to the title to these flats, and as a part of the appropriating clause this provision was inserted in the river and harbor bill of 1882:

It is hereby made the duty of the Attorney-General to examine all claims of the title to the premises to be improved under this appropriation, and see that the rights of the Government, in all respects, are secured and protected. If he deems it necessary he is authorized to cause a suit or suits in law or in equity to be instituted in the name of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against any and all claims of title under any patent which, in his opinion, was by mistake or was improperly or illegally issued for any part of the marshes or flats within the limits of the proposed improvement.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that there was at the very initiation of this work of improvement, at the time of the first appropriation, a doubt in the mind of Congress as to whether it was public or private property, and the Attorney-General, therefore, was authorized and instructed to institute a suit or suits for the purpose of determining that question.

That, for some reason unknown to me, and I venture to say unknown to any one else in this House, has never been done, and this supplementary legislation is intended to secure now what ought to have been obtained when the first appropriation of $400,000 was made.

The claim in this case to title in this property originates from the heirs of one John L. Kidwell. I have just received from the War Department this morning, not with reference to this particular bill, because I did not know that it was coming up to-day, but in connection with a matter that was pending before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, a copy of the patent to John L. Kidwell, giving the boundaries of this disputed territory. It will be seen by an examination of the accompanying chart which I hold in my hand what the extent of the claim is; and it also appears that the whole sum, if I read it aright, paid by John L. Kidwell for these 47¾ acres was $23, and that was as late as 1869. In other words, no longer than fourteen or fifteen years ago some one understood that this Congress in its wisdom would improve these flats—and it required no prophetic power to anticipate anything that this Congress would do—sent a surveyer down among these marshes, or flats under water, procured a survey, and made an entry of these 47¾ acres. From that time until now there has been no legal decision as to the validity of this patent; but in the mean time Congress has gone forward and expended the sum of $900,000, lacking $55,000, in this improvement.

What has been the effect of this expenditure? I need not state to this House that it has largely enhanced the value of this claim, and that which could have been bought, if it has a real existence, at a very trifling sum in 1882 has become enhanced in value, and these claimants may now come forward with a demand for thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky indulge me for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have understood that a large part of the improvements made heretofore have been made on this land about which there is dispute in reference to the title. I wish to know if that is correct, or if the gentleman has information so that he can state whether it is true or not.

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the gentleman from Georgia that the statement is true.

Mr. WILLIS. That is my understanding. I have here, however, a map which will show the gentleman the exact character and extent of the improvement.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed in this bill to do what? In the fourth section of the bill it is proposed to give authority to the District courts to condemn this 47¾ acres, and an amount of money sufficient to pay the value thereof is appropriated out of the Federal Treasury. That part of the bill, not as its enemy but as its friend, I call attention to and criticise. My experience upon one of the committees of this House convinces me that Congress ought never to bind itself in advance to pay for any property to be condemned by any court.

Before Congress is called to appropriate it ought to know to the extent of every dollar what is claimed for these 47¾ acres. And my objection to that part of the bill is that instead of allowing Congress to know the facts and then act, it proposes at one and the same time that the condemnation shall be made and the money, even if it be $2,000,000—there is no limit—shall be immediately appropriated out of the Treasury to make that payment.

I submit to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] that this is not prudent legislation. I submit to him that, in view of the character of this claim and the very remarkable failure, to put it in the mildest terms, of the Attorney-General to institute this suit, which he was directed to do some five or six years ago—in view of the fact that every dollar you expend there is adding to the value day by day of this claim, Congress ought to be first placed in possession of the facts before it is asked to give a blind appropriation of any amount for the purpose.

The only other portion of the bill to which I call attention, and which I submit is in a dangerous direction, is the amendment which has been offered by my friend from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], in which he proposes that any appropriation made by Congress shall be authorized to be expended upon other parts of these flats. Now we know that every dollar that we expend only makes it more difficult to effect a settlement of this claim; and I submit it to him whether it would not be more prudent to let this bill pass without that amendment, and with a clause in it instructing the Secretary of War to report back to this House the amount claimed by these parties, if it can be settled by voluntary purchase, or the amount assessed by the court if it be condemned by judicial proceedings, and then let us see how much we will pay, and not go in the dark and put our hand in the Treasury without knowing how much shall come forth to pay for this claim of 47¾ acres.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Do I understand this bill admits the title to be in the Kidwell heirs?

Mr. BARBOUR. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIS. Not at all. But it authorizes the Attorney-General to institute suit, if he thinks it necessary; and if the title is found to be in the Kidwell heirs, then the bill goes further, and authorizes the condemnation of the property; and it goes further than that—and it is the last step I am criticising—it authorizes the payment of the amount without the intervention of Congress.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Have we gone so far that we must do that?

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir. I am contending against that.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Have the improvements reached that stage that we must have that property?

Mr. WILLIS. That is a question which I presume the engineer would answer affirmatively.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then have we gone blindly so far that we have got to go further?

Mr. WILLIS. That is what I have been saying this proposition amounts to. We have been doing wrong, and it is proposed we shall continue to do wrong. Congress in 1882, when the first appropriation was made, directed the Attorney-General to investigate this title and report. If he had discharged his duty then this claim would either have been settled or it could have been purchased at some small reasonable price, if anything was due for it. But by failure of the Department to institute that suit we are now confronted with a demand for land which has been reclaimed under appropriations by Congress, and the amount, if it be found a valid claim, would now be much greater than it would have been four or five or six years ago. And if we go on and pass this bill and allow the clause which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] offers as an amendment, we are rendering it still more difficult to effect an amicable settlement of this claim. That is the extent to which I criticise this measure. I am not an enemy of this appropriation. I am not prepared to say it ought not to be made; but I stood in the committee in the last Congress and I stand here to-day asking protection against these attempts to appropriate money without knowing whether this is on private or on public land. To that extent my opposition goes, and no further.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 880) granting a right of way to the Schuylkill River and East Side Railroad Company through the arsenal and naval asylum grounds at Philadelphia, Pa.

IMPROVEMENT OF POTOMAC FLATS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I am strongly under the belief that this attempted entry of this land is a fraud or an attempt at fraud upon the Government, and I am for one unwilling to vote for any bill which would in any manner recognize or give any validity to that fraud. So far as this bill is concerned, if it does not recognize this as a valid claim I have no particular objection to it. At the same time I wish to say I concur heartily in what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has said, that this Congress ought not to commit itself to any sum of money that may be fixed by any condemnation proceedings until we know what that amount of money is.

Mr. BARBOUR. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this whole matter has been very much exaggerated by gentlemen around me. As I understand it, the claim of title that is set up against the United States is to some of these swamp lands that have been under water all the time, or have just a small surface exposed at low tide. It appears that there are adverse claims to those lands or a portion of them, and the question is shall those adverse rights be adjudicated and put out of the way. That is the whole question. There is no great amount of money involved. All the objections that have been made have been to the bill as it came from the Senate. The committee of which I am the organ here has reported back that bill with these amendments, and if you are going on with this work, if the work is of the importance it is supposed to be, if it is to be so valuable to the city by removing the malarious emanations that come up from those depressed lands, it seems to me that this question should be set at rest without delay. What would be the use of going into the courts to litigate this question? If it should appear that there are any rights here of private parties, let those rights be determined and let this great public improvement go on. If those rights are adjudicated, and if a condemnation is made, a certain amount of money will be required to meet the report of the tribunal that makes the condemnation, but that it would amount to any large sum I have no sort of expectation. The property about which there is contention is the Kidwell flats, which are only a portion of the ground now under improvement.

Mr. WILLIS. Have you the remotest idea at this time of what the amount would be?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have an idea that it would not exceed $5,000 or $10,000.

Mr. SOWDEN. Then let us fix that limit.

Mr. WILLIS. Suppose it should be $3,000,000?

Mr. BARBOUR. Well, fix a limit beyond which it shall not go.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why we should not authorize an adjudication of the title, and afterward let Congress decide about buying the property if it is found to belong to the other claimants.

Mr. BARBOUR. That course would delay the work very much.

Mr. WILLIS. If I understand the situation, the Kidwell flats, the only part of the river front there that is in dispute, are the part that has been already reclaimed.

Mr. BARBOUR. They have been only partially reclaimed. The work there has been stopped.

Mr. WILLIS. My understanding is that that portion is entirely reclaimed, and that it is not proposed to work on those flats any more.

Mr. BARBOUR. If the gentleman will look at the amendment he will see it is proposed that the value of the land shall be ascertained exclusive of any improvements made by the Government of the United States. Now, with such a provision, how is any large appropriation going to be required?

Mr. WILLIS. I intended to offer an amendment, but I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, and insert a proviso that the amount shall not exceed $10,000. As to his other point, however, I have no idea that the work would be delayed an hour by the course suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], because it is not proposed, as I understand, to go on with that part of the work at present, but the intention is to work upon that portion of the flats the title of which is not in dispute. Therefore, if you have an adjudication of this claim and you report to this Congress or even to the next Congress, the amount that is ascertained, and leave it to Congress to make an appropriation, it really will not delay the work at all.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I will add just one remark in reply to what has fallen from the gentlemen around me. Anybody who knows anything about the work of reclaiming lands along navigable streams, particularly upon a great stream like the Potomac, knows that it is very important to carry on the work continuously and complete it as quickly as possible in view of the freshets that are common in such streams, and that are liable at any time before the completion of the work to undo a great part of it. For this reason alone it seems to me highly desirable that we should avoid all dilatory measures or proceedings in this business. Therefore I say let this title be ascertained and settled, and let this great work go on.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are there not two amendments pending?

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, as follows:

After the word "flats" insert the following: "To which the Government possesses undisputed title."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The object is to limit the expenditure to that portion of the river front to which the Government has a title which is undisputed, not merely the part to which somebody thinks the Government has a good title.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a proposition to go on making improvements which will increase the value of the portion claimed by other parties.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully call the attention of the House to the last section of this bill, which is in these words:

That until the final decision of the matter hereinbefore in this act mentioned shall have been had, no moneys appropriated for the improvement of the Potomac River, the establishment of harbor lines in the District of Columbia, and the raising of the flats therein shall be expended otherwise than upon property in respect of which there is no claim adverse to the title of the United States, or for the improvement of navigation in the said river: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats.

The SPEAKER. It is that part of the bill to which the gentleman from Virginia moves the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, there are some facts connected with this river improvement which it seems to me ought to arrest the attention of Congress. Recurring to what my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has said as to the passage in the form of a Senate amendment of the provision for the improvement of these flats, I have to say that, notwithstanding the question was constantly agitated and brought to the attention of the two Houses, I do not think there has ever been an occasion when, as an independent measure, the House of Representatives would have been willing to assent to the improvement; and the chief objection has always been that the Government had not a clear title to the property. Difficulties in regard to the Kidwell claim and other claims have constantly been suggested; but finally the proposition, along with one or two other propositions which had been rejected in this House, got upon the river and harbor bill as amendments of the Senate, being finally ingrafted upon the bill under the stress of the argument that if the House did not assent the bill might fail.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has called attention to a provision in that bill requiring the Attorney-General to examine into the title before any money should be expended under that appropriation. Yet the House is now confronted with the fact that the Department of Justice never went into that examination of title. The rights of the Government which that provision of the bill sought to secure were utterly disregarded.

We are also in the presence of another fact—that the very portion of the flats which has been in dispute, the Kidwell claim, is among the first to receive attention; and the entire claim of 47½ acres has been improved, although there has been no examination of title. The first money expended is devoted to the improvement of this very property in regard to which there is litigation.

Circumstances like these must suggest to us that behind all this there has been a moving power misleading Congress and bringing us into this humiliating position, that we have been spending public money in the interest of private individuals and in utter disregard of the rights of the Government of the United States.

A part of this bill provides for a continuation of this work. My distinguished and much-respected friend from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] speaks of the importance of this work being continued. For one I am not willing to vote for the expenditure of another dollar for this work in the presence of these circumstances, indicating that up to this hour the Government has been a prey to certain private interests.

I have no objection to such portions of the bill as provide for the extinguishment of the title where there is a claim. But I am not sure that other claims may not turn up; and I am not, and have never been, disposed to be pressed forward regardless of questions of this kind by the suggestion of the importance of the work.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] hands me at this moment a statement from the Attorney-General, in which he says:

It seems from a letter addressed to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate by the attorney of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company that that company claims riparian rights along the river shore between Easby's Point and Seventeenth street; and I am informed that the owners of certain lots called water-lots, which are located between the same points, also claim riparian rights; but none of the claimants of such rights have submitted to this Department any statement of their claims.

Have we not notice that other claimants than the Kidwell claimants will appear as soon as we make further appropriations for this work? What guarantee have we that the first work will not be in the interest of these claimants, just as the money already expended has been largely devoted to the improvement of the Kidwell claims?

Sir, we have been sufficiently misled about Washington matters. We are constantly having foisted upon us misleading statements; and in view of what has been done, in view of the fact that other claims not yet presented to the Department of Justice are likely to be set up, the claimants awaiting perhaps the time when the improvement shall have been made, I trust we shall, like true men, see to it that no additional dollar is appropriated for this work until the rights of the Government are asserted and protected. I do trust that this bill will not pass if it is to be accompanied with any implication on the part of Congress that one dollar more is to be expended before these questions are settled. I know how easy it is to plead urgency, the great value of the flats, the necessity of improving them with a view to the health of the city, &c. I expect this plea to be more and more strongly expressed as the number of claimants to this property multiply.

Mr. COX. What amount has already been expended on this work?

Mr. BLOUNT. I think about $900,000. If I am not correct some gentleman will correct me; and a large part of this sum has been expended upon the very 47½ acres which we were notified in the very incipiency of the debate on this improvement were in litigation.

Mr. BARBOUR. That work is not finished at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says it is not finished. I have a map in my hand that indicates otherwise.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have that map here. The work is marked and defined, but the map does not show that it is finished.

Mr. BLOUNT. But does not my friend concede that a large part of it has been completed?

Mr. BARBOUR. No, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then the gentleman does not read the map as I do and as the chairman of the committee having special charge of the improvement of rivers and harbors [Mr. WILLIS] does.

Mr. BARBOUR. This map is furnished from the engineer's office by the engineer himself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt of that; the only difficulty is, my friend does not read the report as I do, and as the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee does.

Mr. REAGAN. I think there is a misunderstanding as to terms. A great deal of money has been expended on this work, but when it is completed it is to be a great ornamental park. The finishing up with that view has not yet been done.

Mr. BARBOUR. There is a great deal of it not yet done.

Mr. BLOUNT. But a large part of the expenditure has been made for the improvement of property which is in dispute, which is claimed by private parties; and other claimants are to-day hounding on this matter, trying to get up, inside and outside of this House, a sentiment in favor of urging forward this improvement. I never did believe in the pleas which have been heretofore set up in reference to this matter. I always believed, notwithstanding the avowals to the contrary in both Houses of Congress, that we should scarcely commence this work before these claimants would become emphatic as to their rights and a general acquiescence in those claims would begin to grow up in the public mind.

I believe it will continue not only as to the Kidwell claimants, but as to others, until we shall show firmness and determine not to expend a single dollar upon these improvements until we know what our rights are.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to add, after the word "Treasury," in the fifteenth line of the fourth section of the bill, the following words:

Provided, The sum shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

Mr. REAGAN. That would not apply to all the claimants.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will not be adopted. Now, the complaint as to the claim of the Kidwell heirs is well founded——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. DUNN in the chair) There are two amendments already pending, and further amendment is not in order.

Mr. SOWDEN. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to call attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have proceeded somewhat irregularly in this matter, and I do not wish our action to preclude amendment before passing the sixth section of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not under consideration section by section, and amendment to the sixth section will not be precluded by the pending amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand it, then the whole bill is open to amendment.

The SPEAKER. Any part of the bill is subject to amendment until finally disposed of. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. WARNER'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BARBOUR'S amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 25.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I now move to strike out the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will withhold his motion until I can offer an amendment to the fifth section of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. That will not prevent the gentleman's amendment. I will, however, withdraw my motion to strike out the sixth section until his amendment can be submitted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will offer an amendment first to the fourth section, and afterward to the fifth section. First, as to the fourth. I move to strike out all of that fourth section of the bill after the word "States," in the tenth line, and insert in lieu thereof the words "and report thereof shall be made to Congress."

Mr. HOLMAN. The words proposed to be stricken out in the fourth section are:

And may decree that the just value thereof so ascertained by the court be paid to the person or corporation entitled thereto; whereupon all the right, title, and interest of such person or corporation shall vest in the United States, and the sum so ascertained to be the value of such private right, title, or interest shall be paid out of the Treasury.

Instead of providing for the payment of the judgment by the court my amendment provides only that the proceedings of the court shall be reported to Congress.

Then the amendment I propose to the fifth section provides in case of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision of the court below be affirmed, that no payment shall be made until the further action of Congress. The object is to provide no sum of money shall be paid for the extinguishment of claims asserted to the ownership of this property except by action of Congress hereafter, and not upon a single judgment which may be pronounced.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, from the nature of the transaction, from what has been already exposed, it would be the height of imprudence to allow this matter to go beyond the control of Congress. If there is to be an extinguishment of these alleged titles to this property on the part of individuals it should be done in the future, when all the facts are known. I trust, therefore, there will be no objection to adopting the amendment I have proposed, so that we may not act in the dark in this business.

We have all witnessed, during the last four years, this extraordinary pressure to make an appropriation of this money. An appeal has been made on behalf of the absolute necessity to make the appropriation and to complete the improvement in order to preserve the health of the city. Every consideration involving human life and health has been brought forward and Congress has been appealed to and urged to make this appropriation. The appropriation, originally, would not have been made if Congress had not believed it had protected as far as possible the rights of the public by providing that any alleged title claimed should be extinguished in favor of the United States before any money should be spent upon this work; and yet, as has been remarked by the gentleman from Georgia, the sum of eight or nine hundred thousand dollars has been expended, notwithstanding the reasonable precaution of Congress, upon this very property to which it was known at the time there was a claim by private parties. I trust, under such circumstances in addition to what has occurred during the last four years, not one dollar will be allowed to be expended until the whole facts are known.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN], following out the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia that there should be a limit upon the award which may be made, submits an amendment that the amount under the judgment shall not exceed $10,000. I trust that will not be done, for the reason that it is at the very inception a quasi admission on the part of Congress that the claim set up by these parties, under this extraordinary patent in 1869, has some validity. It will be construed, at all events, as a tacit admission on the part of Congress that there was some right in the claim which these parties present. And yet while that be true, it will not enter into the question of the judgment rendered by the tribunal; it will simply be taken to mean that if the judgment shall be rendered for more than $10,000 that only $10,000 of that amount shall be paid.

I trust the House will first take the necessary steps to ascertain the nature and character of the claims and the value of the property, with all of the facilities at its hand by a judicial ascertainment, and then and not until then appropriate the money.

Mr. SOWDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question? How does the gentleman propose to get a report from the United States court to Congress of its findings?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have expressly avoided indicating who shall make that report, or the manner in which it will be made. It can come, of course, through a half-dozen different channels——

Mr. WILLIS. It will come through the Department of Justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. It comes to our judgment through the Department of Justice; and I avoided, on the spur of the moment, saying how it should be done, inasmuch as it is manifest there are a number of channels through which the facts may come to the knowledge of Congress after the adjudication shall be made.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope my friend from Virginia in charge of this bill will accept the proposition which has been suggested. If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is adopted what does it accomplish? It does not stop the improvement for an hour. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with the main proposition which he has at heart. It may postpone, if the court should ascertain that the Kidwell heirs have some claim to this property—it may postpone its payment two or three or six months; but I submit, in view of the propriety of such legislation, that that delay ought not to be a question in his mind. It seems to me this accomplishes all he wants to accomplish and all that is necessary to be accomplished. First let the court judicially ascertain whether the claim is a just one or not, and then let Congress, with that information before it, say what it will do and how much it will pay. I hope he will accept the amendment.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask permission, as this is a matter of some considerable interest and importance, and these papers have been sent to me from another committee, and as they explain this bill—to print with my remarks a letter from the Attorney-General—the present acting Attorney-General, and also the patent of the Kidwell heirs, in order that Congress may have all the facts connected with the matter before it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the documents to which the gentleman refers will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The documents referred to by Mr. WILLIS are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, April 10, 1886.

SIR: Referring to the communication addressed to you by this Department under date of the 7th instant in regard to the Potomac flats, I desire to add, by way of supplement thereto, that the Department has since been furnished with copies of the survey and patent of the Kidwell claim, with a chart showing its locality, certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and also a map indicating the present state of the work for the reclamation of the flats, both at the locality of that claim and along the line of river front (between Seventeenth and Twenty-sixth streets), where the claims of riparian rights are located.

These papers accompanied a communication from John Mullan, esq., dated the 10th instant, a copy of which, together with the papers, is herewith transmitted for the information of your committee.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JOHN GOODE,
Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS,
Chairman of Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, April 7, 1886.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your communication of the 12th ultimo, in which, by direction of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, you inquire, what steps, if any, have been taken in order to establish the title of the United States to the Potomac flats in Washington city; and whether or not, in my opinion, it would be safe and prudent for the committee to make any appropriation for the filling up of said flats at the present time. To these inquiries I now submit the following in reply:

The act of August 2, 1882, chapter 375, by which an appropriation was made for "improving the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington with reference to the improvement of navigation, the establishment of harbor lines, and the raising of the flats," devolved upon the Attorney-General the duty of examining all claims of the title to the premises to be improved under that appropriation, and provided that, "if he deems it necessary, he is authorized to cause a suit or suits in law or in equity to be instituted in the name of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against any and all claimants of title under any patent which, in his opinion, was by mistake or was improperly or illegally issued for any part of the marshes or flats within the limits of the proposed improvement."

Attorney-General Brewster, having received from the Secretary of War sundry papers by which it appeared that in the year 1869 a patent from the United States was issued to one John L. Kidwell, granting a part of the marshes or flats within the limits of the aforesaid improvement, and being of opinion that such patent was by mistake and improperly and illegally issued, and also deeming it necessary for the protection of the rights of the United States that a judicial proceeding to annul the patent should be instituted, on the 28th of January, 1885, instructed the United States attorney for the District of Columbia "to bring a suit in equity in the name of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the said John L. Kidwell, and any and all other persons claiming title under the patent issued as above, to have the said patent set aside or annulled."

Soon after these instructions were given the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, at the last session of Congress (February 23, 1885), reported and recommended the passage of a bill (S. 2655) making more ample and effective provision for protecting the interests of the United States in the premises than that contained in the act of August 2, 1882. By this act the Attorney-General is authorized to bring suit only in cases where the party claims title under a patent for any part of the marshes or flats; and no power is given, should the claim of title ultimately prevail, for ascertaining the value thereof or taking any other steps with a view to its extinguishment. On the other hand, by the Senate bill (should it become a law) the Attorney-General would be authorized to institute a suit "against all persons or corporations who may have or pretend to have any right, title, claim, or interest in any part of the land or water in the District of Columbia within the limits of the city of Washington, or exterior to said limits and in front thereof toward the channel of the Potomac River, and composing any part of the land or water affected by the improvements of the Potomac River or its flats in charge of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of establishing and making clear the right of the United States thereto." This covers not only claims of title to the soil within the limits of the improvement, however such claims may have originated, but claims of riparian rights within the same limits. The bill furthermore provides for ascertaining, in a summary way, the value of any right, title, or interest which the court, on final hearing, shall find to exist as against the United States; and it forever bars all persons and corporations from setting up or maintaining any right, title, interest, or claim in the premises, who shall fail, after such public notice as is therein provided, to appear and litigate the same.

In view of the pendency of this bill before Congress, with the prospect of its early enactment into a law (it has already passed the Senate and is now in the House), there seemed to be some propriety in deferring the commencement of a suit under the existing law (which is wanting in certain respects, as above indicated), until Congress should have an opportunity to manifest its will touching the proposed law—this appearing to be better adapted to effectuate the ends sought to be attained. Accordingly, the district attorney has not, as yet, actually instituted any suit in pursuance of the instructions hereinbefore mentioned; but he has, I am informed, done a considerable amount of work in the way of preparation.

The patent to Kidwell referred to above embraces an area of 47.71 acres. It appears to be the only one which has been issued by the Land Department covering any part of the Potomac flats in front of Washington, and the claim based thereon presents the only claim of title to the flats of which this Department has received any definite information. However, it seems from a letter addressed to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate by the attorney of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company that that company claims riparian rights along the river shore between Easby's Point and Seventeenth street, and I am informed that the owners of certain lots called water-lots, which are located between the same points, also claim riparian rights; but none of the claimants of such rights have submitted to this Department any statement of their claims. As already intimated, the act of 1882 does not authorize the Attorney-General to bring suit against these last-mentioned claimants.

I have, in the foregoing, shown what steps have thus far been taken in order to establish the title of the United States to the Potomac flats as against adverse claims thereto. Briefly stated, they embrace the examination and consideration of the Kidwell claim (no other having been presented to the Attorney-General), the issue of instructions to bring suit to annul the patent on which that claim rests, and preliminary preparation for such suit.

In regard to the point whether it would be safe and prudent to make any appropriation for the filling up of said flats at the present time, I submit that, in the light of the information which I possess, I am unable to perceive wherein the Government would incur any risk, or lose any advantages it now has, should such appropriation be made, especially if its expenditure be limited to those parts of the improvement in respect of which there is no claim adverse to the right and title of the United States. I remark, in this connection, that the Senate bill above referred to, as it passed that body, contains a provision which thus limits the expenditure of moneys appropriated for the improvement until the final decision of the matters therein mentioned.

I deem it proper to add, for the information of your committee, that the attorney representing the claimants under the Kidwell patent, M. F. Morris, esq., has recently addressed me a letter (of which a copy is herewith transmitted) in which he proposes to "convey to the United States, by a good and sufficient deed, all their right, title, interest, and estate in the premises—whatever they have, be it little or great; and leave to the Court of Claims, upon a suit to be brought by themselves, the determination of the amount of compensation, if any, to which they may be entitled." Additional legislation being obviously necessary in order to make this plan available, the attention of the committee is called to the proposition of Mr. Morris as a subject deserving its consideration.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JOHN GOODE,
Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS,
Chairman of Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I notice that the subject of the title to the Potomac flats in front of the city of Washington is yet a matter of solicitude to Congress, and especially to the House Committee on the District of Columbia. You will recall the fact that, as attorney for the persons claiming under the Kidwell patent, I have repeatedly and earnestly solicited that suit should be brought by the United States, under the act of Congress of August 2, 1882 (22 Statutes at Large, page 198), to test the validity of this patent. Nothing whatever has been done in that direction; and I am advised that the district attorney is waiting until legislation can be had to bring in other possible claimants. I beg leave to suggest that I do not see the propriety of combining in one suit different claims that have no possible connection with each other. But in order, if possible, to prevent any and all further difficulty in this matter, so far as the parties entitled under the Kidwell patent are concerned, I hereby propose, as attorney for these parties, that they will convey to the United States, by a good and sufficient deed, all their right, title, interest, and estate in the premises—whatever they have, be it little or great—and leave to the Court of Claims, upon a suit to be brought by themselves, the determination of the amount of compensation, if any, to which they may be entitled. If their patent is worthless or fraudulent, they will be entitled to no compensation. If, on the contrary, the patent is valid, the Court of Claims can readily determine the amount of compensation that should be paid for the transfer of the title. The deed can be executed at once and deposited with you—in escrow or otherwise, as may be deemed proper—subject to ratification by Congress, which undoubtedly could be easily obtained.

Is there any possible objection to this plan? And does it not remove all the difficulty in this case? Of course it is subject to any modification that you may deem reasonable and proper in the interest of the United States.

Very respectfully,

M. F. MORRIS.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND,
Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1886.

SIR: I beg to inform you that I am counsel for Messrs. Benson & McNee, of San Francisco, Cal., and now engaged in Washington city, D. C., under a contract with the United States, through the Chief of Engineers and the War Department, in dredging the channel of the Potomac River in front of the city of Washington, and by virtue of that relation I ask to be permitted to lay before you certain matters which truly seem to come within the purview of your Department to take due cognizance of.

In the Book of Estimates submitted to Congress to continue the work of improvement by the Government of various rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the War Department, upon the recommendation of the Chief Engineer, included an estimate of $800,000 for improvement of the Potomac River in front of the city of Washington.

But it would appear that the House committee in Congress having charge of the river and harbor appropriation bill, having the subject-matter under consideration, concluded to omit from said bill, to wit, H. R. 7480, when reporting same to the House, any appropriation therefor, and because of the reasons by them assigned, the words as follows, to wit: "No appropriation has been made for the improvement of the Potomac River and flats for the reason that the title to the reclaimed land is in dispute, and until some satisfactory information on that subject has been furnished it is not thought prudent to expend money in that direction." (See copy of House Report 1448 herewith.) The land, title to which is alleged to be in dispute, is known as the "Kidwell Meadows," sometimes called the "Kidwell Flats" or "Kidwell Bottoms."

But I desire to call your attention to the exact locus of said "Kidwell Meadows," as per patent thereof from the United States herewith, and marked Exhibit No. 2, and also to the locus of the proposed improvement, as per War Department map, Exhibit 3, and showing that the proposed improvement nowhere includes or infringes upon said "Kidwell meadows."

I assume that the information that will be satisfactory to the committees in Congress having charge of the subject-matter and of Congress itself would be such information as herein contained, and that the same could be probably laid before said bodies by your Department. Wherefore I now move you that you may be pleased to communicate these facts, and such other facts relating to the subject-matter as will afford that "satisfactory information" which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors would seem to need, and without which it would further seem no appropriation will be made for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1887. Every well-informed person fully appreciates the necessity for the continuing of this improvement, and the only obstacle in the way seems to be that hereinbefore contained and set forth.

Those that I represent, aside from sharing the general interest of the public in these premises, have expended nearly $200,000 in a plant, supposing the United States would in good faith complete that which they had so well commenced.

The urgency of this matter justifies, in my opinion, that this matter be laid before you in every proper way, as the questions of title and of the locus of the disputed territory can be more properly passed upon by your Department than by any other. Wherefore I now respectfully ask that this matter may have your immediate consideration and early action.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN MULLAN,
Counsel for Benson & McNee.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND,
United States Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, December 3, 1869.

I certify that John L. Kidwell has this day deposited to the credit of the United States $3.86 on account of vacant lands in the Potomac River, above the Long Bridge, for which I have signed duplicate receipts.

L. R. TUTTLE,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

To the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

I certify that I have surveyed a plat or parcel of land near to and adjoining the Washington shore of the Potomac River, separated from the mainland by a boat channel from 3 to 5 feet deep and from 10 to 50 feet wide, extending from Twenty-first street west to Easby's ship-yard, for John L. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
November 10, 1869.

The foregoing survey of "Kidwell's meadows," on re-examination of the premises on the 17th and 24th October, 1869, were found to be above the tide at low as well as high tides, the said survey being of the land subject to the operation of the joint resolution of Congress of 16th February, 1839, volume 5, page 365. The same is hereby approved.

STEPHEN J. DALLAS,
Private Clerk of Surveys and ex-officio Examiner-General.

The United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas John L. Kidwell, of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, hath deposited in the General Land Office of the United States evidence bearing date the 3d September, 1867, and the 3d December, 1869, whereby it appears that full payment has been made to the Treasurer of the United States by the said John L. Kidwell for a tract of vacant land containing 47.71 acres, called "Kidwell's Meadows," and lying in the Potomac River above the Long Bridge, according to the official certificate and plat of survey thereof, bearing date the 10th and 12th of October, 1867, made and returned by the survey of Washington County, in the district aforesaid, pursuant to a special warrant of survey unto the said surveyor directed on the 26th day of June, A. D. 1867, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office aforesaid, in virtue of the authority of Congress, under a resolution "directing the manner in which certain laws of the District of Columbia shall be executed," approved on the 16th day of February, 1839, and which tract of land is shown by the aforesaid certificate and plat of survey, to be bounded and described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a cedar post firmly planted at low water, on which is inscribed the letters "J. L. K.," at a point bearing north 84° west from the center of the Dome of the Capitol and south 43° 30′ west from the center of the dome of the Observatory, and distant about one-fourth of a mile from thence by compass bearings—north 66° 30′ west 5 perches; thence north 32° west 15 perches; thence south 81° east 10 perches; thence north 49° 30′ west 20 perches; thence north 22° 45′ west 20 perches; thence north 13° 15′ west 15 perches; thence north 73° 30′ east 2.4 perches; thence south 28° 45′ east 2 perches; thence south 59° east 2 perches; thence south 73° east 8 perches; thence south 84° 45′ east 7.6 perches; thence south 56° 30′ east, 18 perches; thence south 60° 45′ east 20 perches; thence south 49° east 20 perches; thence south 40° east 10 perches; thence south 46° east 12 perches; thence south 71° 30′ east 74 perches; thence south 28° 30′ east 54 perches; thence south 24° 30′ west 18 perches; thence north 47° west 24 perches; thence north 72° west 48 perches; thence north 63° 30′ west 32 perches; thence north 60° west 14 perches; thence in a straight line to place of beginning, containing 47 acres and 71-100 of an acre of land, more or less, without improvements.

Now, know ye, that the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, and in conformity with the resolution of Congress aforesaid, and the laws in such cases made and provided, have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, unto the said John L. Kidwell, and to his heirs, the said tract of land above described; to have and to hold the same, together with all the rights, immunities, privileges, and appurtenances of whatsoever nature thereunto belonging, unto the said John L. Kidwell, and to his heirs and assigns forever.

In testimony whereof, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the General Land Office to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington the 6th day of December A. D. 1869, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-fourth.

By the President:

U. S. GRANT,
By I. N. BURRITT, Secretary.
J. N. GRANGER,
Recorder of the General Land Office.

Recorded volume 4, pages 304, 305, 306, 307, and 308.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I can not accept the amendment which has been suggested by the gentleman, for the reason that I think the effect of that proposition would be to postpone and delay the construction of what I regard as a most important improvement already in progress on these flats.

What is the proposition submitted by the committee? Why, it is a very plain one. Here is a tribunal selected—selected by you on the part of the United States—to test this whole question of title. You select a court to which you will go and litigate the rights of the United States as against these private individuals. You have in addition to that tribunal, for your protection, an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and yet these gentlemen, these guardians of public interests from Georgia, Indiana, Texas, and Kentucky, they see great danger in such a proceeding. Why, sir, can you not trust your Government to sustain a litigation with a private party? Are you so weak that, even when you select your own tribunal with the privilege of appeal to the Supreme Court, you are afraid to go into this fight with these little fellows in the District of Columbia, Kidwell and Company?

Now, when you talk of private interest, I want to say that I have not heard of any in our committee. That committee has not been approached by private parties.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will you allow me a question just here?

Mr. BARBOUR. No, sir; allow me to get through with my own statement.

One would infer from the remarks of the gentlemen, these special guardians of the public interests, that this was a bill appropriating a large amount of money for the reclamation of the Potomac flats; that it was the old original question that was here for our consideration. The fact is the bill is reported in the interest of the Government. It is reported for its protection. Its very title indicates that, being—

To provide for and protect the interest of the United States in the Potomac River flats in the District of Columbia.

The money has been already appropriated; the work has been going on, contracts have been made, and the whole thing is in a fair state of progress. But even if any value is given to the property of private parties, or if private claims shall be enhanced before there is any completion of the work, you still protect in this bill the interests of the United States, for you provide that this tribunal shall litigate these rights. Now, upon what terms do you litigate? Why you are to litigate the value of this property as it was before any improvement was made by the United States Government at all.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the bill say that?

Mr. BARBOUR. It does. Gentlemen have not read this bill. They have been discussing some other bill all the time. This is a simple bill to protect the interests of the United States, not a proposition to take money from the Treasury at all. And here is a tribunal which has been erected for the purpose of trying this thing, and making an award to settle with private parties if there shall be any just claim, while at the same time the work is permitted to go on.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. What public interest will be injured by the postponement of the payment of this claim, if found to be a just one, for six or eight months?

Mr. BARBOUR. We do not know what six or eight months might bring forth. There might come a freshet, an inundation, that would wash the whole thing away. On the other hand, I do not think anything is to be gained by delay.

Mr. REAGAN. My honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] tells us the object of this bill is to quiet the title involved to the Potomac flats; to secure to the United States a title. So far as that goes we all agree with him. But we tell him in view of the fact that Congress passed a law at the time the first appropriation of $400,000 was made requiring the Attorney-General, before the work went on, to investigate the title, and in view of the fact that no such investigation has been made—at least we have no information that such an investigation has been made—and in view of the fact that nearly $900,000 have been expended with the full knowledge that other claimants set up title to this property—under these circumstances we ask the gentleman from Virginia to accept our help in getting an investigation of this subject, and to accept our suggestion that we stop the expenditure of money until a settlement of the question of title is obtained. That settlement of the question of title may be obtained without appropriating money, without continuing the existing improvements, without involving the Government in additional expenditure. While we make provisions for the ascertainment of title, we do ask that appropriations and expenditures of money on that land shall cease until the question of title is determined.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the fourth section proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 63, noes 17.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the fifth section the following:

"Provided, That no payment under any such judgment shall be made unless hereafter authorized by Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] desired to make an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to strike out the portion of the sixth section which is in italics.

The SPEAKER. The part in italics is the amendment proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which has just been adopted by a vote of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. This proviso if allowed to remain will be incongruous with the other amendments.

Mr. BARBOUR. Not at all.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall move to reconsider the vote adopting that amendment, which I will read:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats.

The SPEAKER. That has been adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. An amendment was offered to that proposition by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], and that was amended on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas to examine the whole language as it now stands, because otherwise his amendments may go beyond the point he aims at. Let him call for the reading of the whole proposition as it now stands.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the sixth section as it now stands as amended be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That until the final decision of the matter hereinbefore in this act mentioned shall have been had, no moneys appropriated for the improvement of the Potomac River, the establishment of harbor lines in the District of Columbia, and the raising of the flats therein shall be expended otherwise than upon property in respect of which there is no claim adverse to the title of the United States, or for the improvement of navigation in the said river, or upon portions of the flats to which the Government possesses undisputed title: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats.

Mr. REAGAN. My motion is to strike out all after the word "expended," in line 5. Or I will move to strike out the entire section.

The object of my motion is to obviate the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which contemplates the continuance of improvements on parts of the ground to which the Government has undisputed title. If that is done, we continue to improve the value of the property claimed by private parties and to increase the difficulty of the Government obtaining title to it. That is the objection I have to that proposition. I also object to the proviso:

That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats.

I do not know what amount of the money appropriated for this work remains unexpended on the flats. I do not know what other appropriations may be obtained for the purpose. But we ought certainly to suspend the expenditure of public money on property to which it does not appear that the Government has a just title.

It may be said we may be involved in some difficulty about a contract. It is better to pay the damage that may result from revoking a contract than to continue to expend money that is being expended as this is in the face of a law which we are advised declares it should not be expended until the Attorney-General had examined the title. There is something about this that does not bear a good face. We are going on expending money, and we are asked in this bill to continue the expenditure of money on a part or parts of these flats when it was contemplated and provided by law in 1882, when the first $400,000 was appropriated, that no portion of the money should be expended until the Attorney-General had investigated the title.

Now, what I want is to strike out the section, so as to avoid the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], which contemplates continuing the work, and to avoid the effect of this proviso, which takes away from the Government the power to arrest an unlawful contract. I do not think, however, that in the face of the law these contractors could claim damages, for they must know that their contracts are made in violation of the law when made without the examination by the Attorney-General, which the law requires. Therefore, if my suggestion upon the legal question is correct, I would say that the Government need have no fear of having to pay damages because of the revocation of contracts made in violation of law.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], he proposes to strike out the whole of the sixth section.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman will find that that will leave the bill in a form which he does not intend, because that section contains an actual prohibition against the expenditure of any futher money on this improvement until the final adjustment of the title. Two amendments that have already been made to this bill ought, I think, to be reconsidered. One is the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], which proposes that the work shall continue upon that portion of the river front as to which there is no dispute about the title. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted, and then, if that is reconsidered, a motion will be in order to reconsider the provision adopted on the report of the committee itself, provided that "nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to affect existing lawful contracts for work on said flats." That means, of course, that the work shall go on, and the reconsideration of the vote by which that was adopted as well as of the other amendment leaves the prohibition complete.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] any objection to modifying his proposition?

Mr. REAGAN. I will modify it by moving to strike out the section and insert in lieu thereof a provision that no money shall be expended until the question of title has been determined.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that he use the language which he will find in the bill, "that until the final decision of the matter hereinbefore in this act mentioned shall have been had no moneys appropriated for the Potomac River, the establishment of harbor lines in the District of Columbia, and the raising of the flats therein, shall be expended."

Mr. REAGAN. I accept the suggestion, and will put it in form and send it up to the desk.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the amendment applies to money already appropriated?

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be the effect.

Mr. BARBOUR. I hope it will not be the pleasure of the House to adopt the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. The effect of it will be to stop this work, although the money has been already appropriated and contracts have been made to a certain extent for the improvement of these flats. There is no new appropriation in this bill. The contractors are only going on with the work which has been let to them in the regular way—I believe under the authority of the Secretary of War.

If this amendment be adopted its effect will be to arrest the work now under contract, to disturb the rights and interests that have accrued under those contracts, and to postpone the completion of a work which has been deemed of great importance to the city of Washington and to the country at large. Where an appropriation has already been made, and where the work can go on upon portions of the river front as to which there is no dispute about title, it strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that to arrest the work under such circumstances would be very unwise, and that the interposition of this House ought not to be invoked to that end.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] says there is an appropriation already made, and that this provision will stop the continuance of the work under the existing appropriation, and he does not think that ought to be done. Sir, that is just exactly what it seems to me ought to be done. Within a few minutes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] has stated that the Committee on the District of Columbia were not informed of any other claimants than the Kidwell claimants.

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know that I said so.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman does not remember to have said that?

Mr. BARBOUR. I said that was the only one I knew anything about.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman said that was the only one he knew anything about, and he is the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, having better opportunities than other men of knowing about such matters; yet the Attorney-General of the United States in a communication to this House notifies us that there are other claimants, numbers of them. In the face of such a declaration from the Attorney-General shall we go on here and do what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] wishes us to do, just because an appropriation has been made? Shall we let this work go on regardless of whether it is done on public property or on private property? Sir, when this scheme of improving these flats was initiated no man gainsaid the propriety in the presence of threatened litigation of a declaration in the statute that not a dollar should be expended until the title of the Government was settled beyond all question. Why is not that a correct proposition to-day? In the presence of this official notice from the Department of Justice that there are numerous other claimants to this property, why should we not stand still until it is determined how many there are, what their rights are, and what are the rights of the Government?

Why shall we recklessly go forward, blind to the interests of the Government, and expend money as we have been doing for the benefit of private persons? Gentlemen ask, would we stop the work? Why is there such a great passion in this House to go on with this work that we can not take care of the interests of the Government, that we can not stop to inquire about matters of which the most dignified and authoritative notice comes from the Attorney-General?

Sir, I do trust that this House will not consent to the expenditure of another dollar until it shall be fully ascertained who are the claimants and what are the rights of the Government. If we should, without inquiry, go on with this work and afterward when the public treasure has been expended it should turn out that there are not only Kidwell claims but canal claims and various others, what can we do but hang our heads in shame that we have deliberately gone forward and brought this scandal upon the House and upon the Government? I trust that this House, in the interest of its own integrity, will not incur the possibility of having this scandal come upon it, even though it may be suggested that by taking proper precautions we may necessitate the stoppage of the work. Is it possible that, with such a wrong threatening us, we can not stay the contractors, can not take time to inquire into this matter? I trust not.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I modify my amendment by inserting after the word "river" the words "within the District of Columbia." It is suggested that without these words the amendment might seem to exclude the idea of improving any part of the Potomac River. The addition of these words will certainly do no harm.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the amendments which have heretofore been suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and generally with the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. I do not think, however, that this last amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas should be adopted. I know something of this matter by reason of three years' service on the committee having charge of the river and harbor bill, in which the appropriations for the improvement of these flats have always been made. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Georgia are in error as respects the history of this appropriation. Congress has never directed (and in this Congress has been at fault) that no part of the money appropriated for the flats should be expended until the title thereto should be settled. I will give the history of this appropriation. It first appeared in the river and harbor bill of 1882. At the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress the Committee on Commerce, then having jurisdiction of the improvement of rivers and harbors, did not report in the river and harbor bill of that year an appropriation for the improvement or reclamation of these flats; but when the bill came to be considered in the Senate Committee on Commerce, that committee attached to the bill an amendment appropriating $400,000 for this purpose.

There was annexed to that appropriation a clause in the nature of a proviso, but it did not declare that no part of the money should be expended until the question of title had been settled. On the contrary, there was an outright appropriation of $400,000; and under the terms of the appropriation the then Secretary of War had no discretion, but was obliged to proceed in the work of reclaiming the flats. To bear out this construction I will read from the law itself:

> Improving the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington with reference to the improvement of navigation, the establishment of harbor lines, and the raising of the flats, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and in accordance with the plan and report made in compliance with the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1881, and the reports of the board of engineers made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of December 13, 1881, $400,000.

That is a substitute proposition, making an outright appropriation of $400,000, and directing the Secretary of War to expend the money in accordance with an existing plan. Then the act goes on to provide:

> And it is hereby made the duty of the Attorney-General to examine all claims of the title to the premises to be improved under this appropriation, and see that the rights of the Government in all respects are secured and protected.

This, it will be observed, is not a provision that none of the money shall be expended until this examination by the Attorney-General shall have been made. There was a direction to the Secretary of War to expend the money; and the same law contained a direction to the Attorney-General—to do what? To proceed with the investigation of the title and to see that the rights of the Government were protected. But the duties imposed upon the Attorney-General were one thing, and the duties imposed upon the Secretary of War were quite another.

I repeat, there was nothing in the river and harbor act of 1882 which provided that no part of the money appropriated should be expended until the Attorney-General had made this investigation and ascertained that the title of the Government was good.

Mr. BLAND. I notice that the appropriation was made subject to the provisions of the act of 1881. Was there anything in that law of 1881 bearing upon this question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am not speaking of that; I am not familiar with the phraseology of that particular measure; I am dealing with the law of 1882.

Mr. BLAND. My point is this: That appropriation was made subject to the provisions of the law of 1881; and if that law contained anything restricting the expenditure of the money we ought to know it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will not assert anything on that point, because I am not familiar with the legislation of 1881. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] can perhaps give us the information.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the proviso the gentleman has just read is the one which I referred to as attached to the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman states that he thinks the proviso he has referred to is the one I have read, and if it be the only one, then I submit there was a positive direction to the Secretary of War to proceed with the expenditure of this money for the purpose named—the reclamation of the flats; and at the same time there was a direction to the then Attorney-General to see that the rights of the Government were protected in respect to the title to the flats; but it was not provided anywhere that the performance of the duty assigned to the Secretary of War, or any part of it, should be postponed until the Attorney-General should have performed the duty imposed on him. The Secretary of War, under the direction made in that law, proceeded to expend the $400,000 in the reclamation of the flats. With any failure of duty on the part of the then Attorney-General the Secretary of War had nothing to do. I repeat, the Secretary of War was not directed by the act to wait until the Attorney-General had examined and reported upon the title.

But I had not finished reading the proviso, and will continue:

> And if he—

That is, the Attorney-General—

> deems it necessary, he is authorized to cause a suit or suits in law or in equity to be instituted, in the name of the United States, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, against any and all claimants of title under any patent which in his opinion was by mistake or was improperly or illegally issued for any part of the marshes or flats within the limits of the proposed improvement.

Now, it will be seen by the House that did nothing more than direct the Attorney-General to inquire into the title, and bring suits if necessary. It appears he did not do this. The Secretary of War was not to wait until he did it; on the contrary, he was to proceed with the improvement, and he did it; and for so doing he is not fairly amenable to criticism by any gentleman on this floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The bill first went on to provide appropriation for the work to be done under the direction of the Secretary of War, and then at the same time the very same authority imposed upon the Attorney-General the duty to inquire into the title of the Government. I ask if a fair construction would not be that the Attorney-General should inquire as to the title of the Government before the money should be expended, or whether the gentleman would regard the Secretary of War was justified in going on to expend the money until the Attorney-General had reported as to the validity of the Government's title to the property?

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is a well-known principle of the interpretation of laws which my friend from Georgia overlooked for a moment when he asked me that question, and that is that the plain letter of a law is not to be evaded under pretense of pursuing its spirit. It was laid down in the law of 1882 as distinctly as any one could lay it down that the Secretary of War was to proceed with this improvement of the flats, and it was laid down as distinctly as could be that the Attorney-General was to investigate this title. One official it seems performed his duty and the other did not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all this is but preliminary to the point I am going to make in opposition to the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. Not only was $400,000 appropriated in 1882, with the direction that it should be used in the reclamation of the flats, but in 1884 the Senate put on an amendment to the river and harbor bill of that year directing an appropriation of $500,000 to continue the work. In the last appropriation there was no proviso at all. It was simply a direction for the continuance of the work, and appropriating half a million dollars for that purpose. Under that direction of Congress the Secretary of War went forward with the improvement, so that up to the present time in the neighborhood of $900,000 has been expended on this work.

My information is the improvement of the flats embraces about 700 acres. My further information is that the claim of the Kidwell heirs or the Kidwell assignees embraces but a small portion of these 700 acres—47 out of the 700. There is one other claim, I believe.

Mr. REAGAN. There are several claimants.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There are one or two other claims; the Chesapeake Canal Company, or some such corporation, asserts a claim. Now, Mr. Speaker, here are 700 acres which belong to the Government of the United States, except as parts of the property may be owned by the Kidwell heirs and other parties, whose rights it is proposed to buy out.

Under these two appropriations, aggregating $900,000, contracts have been made with individuals, and in pursuance of these contracts this work is being done. All of this $900,000 has not been expended, although the greater part of it has been; all of it or nearly all of it, so far as my information extends, is pledged under existing contracts. These contracts made on the part of the Government, by which individuals acquired vested rights, should not be interfered with by any legislation of Congress. It would be a species of repudiation. It is interfering with vested rights, and I call that fact to the attention of this House.

Surely out of the 700 acres of the flats which it is proposed to reclaim or improve there is enough about which there is and can be no dispute as to the title to justify this House in saying that these contracts now in force shall be carried out. If it be necessary an amendment might be inserted providing that no part of the money on hand shall be expended on any part of the flats over which adverse claims hang. But do not stop the work; allow it to go on so far as the contracts based upon past appropriations are concerned.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am.

Mr. STORM. And I am informed that that committee, having examined the question of title, refused to make any appropriation in the present river and harbor bill because of the unsatisfactory character of the Government's title to this property. Is that correct?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is correct, I will state to the gentleman. It is not only correct, but I myself, as a member of that committee, concurred heartily in that conclusion. I say that Congress ought not to make a further appropriation of a dollar for the reclamation of these flats until this question of title shall have been definitely settled. But that is entirely a different proposition from the one I have been discussing. My remarks have referred to past appropriations containing no inhibition of the expenditure of the money until the question of title shall have been settled and upon which appropriations existing contracts are based.

As I am reminded by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and in order to show the House how that committee has always endeavored to guard the rights of the Government, I will read the provision referring to the Kidwell flats as incorporated in the river and harbor bill reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress:

Improvement of Potomac River and raising the flats at Washington, D. C.: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

Provided, That before any part of this sum shall be expended on any part of said work a report shall be made by the Attorney-General of the United States to the Secretary of War upon the validity of the title of the United States to said flats in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 2, 1882: And provided further, That the Secretary of War, after receiving said report, shall be satisfied that said title is good.

That, too, was the committee's position in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress; and acting upon it the committee refused to include in their bill of that session an appropriation for these flats; but it was put in in the Senate and insisted on there, and it went in the bill finally as a Senate amendment.

In the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress we were called upon to make an appropriation for continuing the work, and did incorporate such a provision, but coupled with it the proviso that the money should not be expended until the titles were found to be in the Government, or until the adverse titles should be acquired by the Government.

The river and harbor bill of the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress, as is well known, did not become a law.

Now, what we said in the bill which failed is not what Congress said in 1882, as I have pointed out. It was not what it said in 1884 either. So that the Secretary of War found himself with two appropriations on hand, made by Congress, and aggregating in all $900,000, to prosecute the work, and nowhere in the laws making the appropriations was it anywhere said that the money should not be expended until the titles were found to be good. The Secretary of War then went on with the work, as was his duty, and made these contracts with private individuals, and in these contracts private rights are vested. The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]—a gentleman for whose judgment I have the highest respect—the effect of that amendment, if adopted, would be to cut short these contracts, to repudiate, so to speak, the obligation of the Government toward individuals. That, I say, Congress ought not to attempt to do, and legally can not do.

Let these contracts go on, and let us confine ourselves to putting into this bill a proviso that all the money remaining on hand shall be expended on that portion of the flats only about which there is no dispute as to the title.

Mr. BARBOUR. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that this discussion has proceeded far enough for the information of the House, and I therefore move the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia, provided he will renew the motion at the expiration of three minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Louisiana says that it will interfere with certain contracts if we do not allow this money to be expended, possibly upon private property——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not misquote me. I said nothing about expending it upon private property. I said the work should go on under the contracts, but to limit the expenditure to work upon such portions of the improvement as presented no question of title.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I would rather withdraw the statement than yield the time.

The gentleman from Louisiana insisted, as I understood him, at all events, that we ought not to interfere with the contracts already made for the prosecution of this work. We know—we are warned—that this title is defective in several respects and that this improvement is being made upon private property; for we have the Kidwell claim before us; the Attorney-General invites our attention to two or three claimants who are named, and we are also informed that there are others. I ask the House therefore if it is not better that we should suspend the operation of the contracts now in force and not expend the money in this way until this question of title shall be settled? Then, if we have damaged the contractors in any manner by the suspension of the work, we can compensate them and proceed in a more business-like and logical method than by expending the money in the way proposed.

We can do justice in a shorter, a better, and a higher way by stopping this work. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] calls attention to a provision of the river and harbor bill of last Congress providing the very thing my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is now wanting—that no part of the appropriation shall be expended until the litigation is settled, until the rights of the Government are determined. There was a struggle with the Senate, and we had to abandon so upright a provision in order to prevent the river and harbor bill failing. And we have had this struggle all the while against examination of the title before an expenditure of money. It comes to-day not for the first time. It has come up in struggle after struggle between the two Houses. It has come up in various debates, and up to this hour these claimants have whipped the Government, and the Government has been left to the mercy of an improper administration of public affairs. You find to-day the great bulk of the Kidwell bottoms improved while there has been no examination of title. It is time we should rise to what is justice to the Government and see that wrong is not continued. I now, for the gentleman from Virginia, demand the previous question on the amendment and on ordering the bill as amended to a third reading.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to strike out the sixth section and insert what has been read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 27.

Mr. BARBOUR. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. I withdraw the demand for tellers.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANATOMICAL SCIENCE.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now call up the bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers, having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly authorized agent of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense, said bodies to be distributed among the several colleges equitably, the number assigned to each being proportioned to that of its students: Provided, however, That if the deceased person, during his last illness, of his own accord request to be buried; or if, within forty-eight hours after his death, any person claiming to be, and satisfying the authorities that he is, a relative by blood or marriage, or friend, of the deceased, asks to have the body buried, or if such deceased person was a stranger or traveler who suddenly died, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

SEC. 2. That every physician or surgeon, before receiving such dead body, shall give to the officers surrendering the same to him a sufficient bond that each body shall be used only for the promotion of anatomical and surgical knowledge within the District of Columbia, and that after having been so used the remains thereof shall be decently buried; and whosoever shall use such body or bodies for any purpose other than that aforesaid, or shall remove the same beyond the limits of the said District of Columbia, and whoever shall sell or buy such body or bodies, or in any way traffic in the same, or who shall disturb or remove bodies from graves in which they have been buried, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be imprisoned for a term not less than two nor more than three years, at hard labor, in the District (or city) jail.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 49, noes 13.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now to resign to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] the residue of the time alloted to the Committee for the District?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not resign the time; but if the committee does not call up further business it will be for the House to proceed to other business, as it may determine.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. BARBOUR. Before that is done my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] desires me to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3426), to incorporate the American College for the Blind. I desire to state that there is an adverse report from the committee on that bill. The gentleman from Kentucky desires to offer an amendment. If there is objection to the consideration of the bill, I will yield the right of way to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. WILLIS. I withdraw my request to have that bill considered.

ELECTION CONTEST—CAMPBELL VS. J. B. WEAVER.

Mr. TURNER. I submit, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. HALL], the report of the Committee on Elections in the case of Campbell vs. Weaver, from the State of Iowa.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire hereafter to file the views of the minority in this case. We have not yet seen the report of the majority, and we ask for a week to prepare our report.

There was no objection, and the views of the minority were ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

ANATOMICAL SCIENCE BILL.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BENNETT. Is there any way by which a member on this floor can make his protest against the passage of the bill called up a while ago entitled "A bill for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves?" It is a bill which gives our poor folks to be used for anatomical purposes. I want to go on the record against that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be understood of course, from what he has said, as being against the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I want the same thing to be understood of myself.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And so do I.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5886) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to pass by that bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the next general appropriation bill on the Calendar, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6392) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I make the same request as to that bill.

There was no objection, and the consideration of the bill was passed over for the present.

The Clerk read the title of the next general appropriation bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6395) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I make the same request as to that bill.

There being no objection, the consideration of the bill was passed over for the present.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next general appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6397) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with all general debate on this bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to dispense with the first reading of the bill and that it be now considered under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The paragraphs "for salaries and contingent expenses" having been read,

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether in the paragraphs just read providing for salaries there is any change in salaries, any decrease or any increase?

Mr. WILSON. No increase at all, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs to concrete pavements, with the same or other not inferior material, $55,000; for materials for permit work, $50,000; and hereafter the commissioners of the District are authorized to apply such material to, and pay from this appropriation, the cost of labor for the improvement and repair of alleys and sidewalks when, in their opinion, such course is necessary for the public health, safety, or comfort: Provided, That the costs of labor shall be charged against and become a lien on the abutting property, and its collection shall be enforced in the same manner as the collection of general taxes; for continuation of surveys of the District of Columbia with reference to the extension of various avenues to the District line, $4,000; for sewers, $45,000; for work on sundry avenues and streets, and replacement of pavements in localities named in Appendix Ff annexed to the estimates of the commissioners of the District for 1887, $256,000; in all, $410,000.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, by instruction of the committee, I move to add a proviso at the end of line 154, as follows:

Provided also, That no contract shall be made for making or repairing concrete or asphalt pavement at a higher price than $2 per square yard for a quality equal to the best heretofore laid in the District.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Erection of brick stable, concreting the yard, paving cellar, setting stone steps at sixth and seventh precinct station, and erection of stable at seventh precinct station, $5,000; police signal and telephone system first precinct, including patrol-wagon, $4,500; reconstructing cells in third precinct, $600; in all, $344,160.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a verbal change in line 318 by adding after the word "sixth" the words "and seventh;" and changing the word "station" to "stations."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one health officer, $3,000; six sanitary inspectors, at $1,200 each; two food inspectors, at $1,200 each; one inspector of marine products, $1,200; for one clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,400; three clerks, at $1,200 each; one messenger, $540; one poundmaster, $1,200; laborers, at not exceeding $30 per month, $1,440; and for contingent expenses, including books, stationery, fuel, rent, repairs to pound, and vehicles, forage, meat for dogs, horseshoeing, and other necessary items, $2,500; removal of garbage and ashes, $20,000; purchase of one horse for pound service, $200; in all, $46,480.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by inserting in line 452 the words "maintenance of ambulance service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Under the instruction of the committee, I propose to add at the end of section 2 of the bill the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 2 insert:

"And all the drawback certificates heretofore or hereafter received for general taxes under the acts of June 27, 1879, and July 5, 1884, and paid or deposited in the Treasury, shall be considered and treated as money in the settlement of accounts between the United States and the District of Columbia under this or any other act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report this bill with the amendments to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6397) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on the adoption of the amendments and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendments made in Committee of the Whole; and they were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, as no statement was made explanatory of the bill, I ask that the report be printed, with the bill, in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. WILSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the bill making appropriations for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found on pages 206 to 214 of the Book of Estimates, and, exclusive of the water department, aggregate $3,656,385.97, one-half of which amount, or so much thereof as Congress may appropriate, is required to be drawn from the revenues of the General Government, and the remaining one-half to be levied upon the taxable property and privileges in the District of Columbia, other than the property of the United States and the District of Columbia, pursuant to section 3 of the act approved June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia." (Statutes at Large, volume 20, page 102.)

The total amount recommended to be appropriated for the general expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1887 in the bill submitted herewith is, exclusive of the water department, $3,432,874.97, of which sum the General Government is required to pay $1,716,437.48, that being the one-half of the whole sum. The whole amount recommended is $193,511 less than the estimates.

The amount appropriated for the general expenses of the District of Columbia for the current fiscal year is $3,433,286.93, being $411.96 more than is recommended in the accompanying bill for 1887.

The amount recommended for the water department and payable from the water revenues, and which is not included in the sums above, is $178,788.02. The amount appropriated for the same purposes for the current fiscal year is $189,396 27.

The amount recommended for the support of the indigent insane of the District is $75,132, being $21,670 in excess of the current appropriation and the estimate of the commissioners for the year 1887, and will result in the reduction, to that extent, of the sum to be given for 1887 in the sundry civil bill for the general support of the Government Hospital for the Insane. Had this transfer not been made, the bill as reported would have aggregated in all a sum $22,081.96 less than the current law.

The action of the committee in increasing the sum for the support of the indigent insane, as aforesaid, is based upon reasons set forth in a letter from the superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, which is made a part of this report.

Following is a table explaining in detail the bill as compared with the estimates for 1887 and appropriations for 1886, also a table exhibiting the estimated receipts of the District during the fiscal year 1887.

[Government Hospital for the Insane, W. W. Godding, M. D., superintendent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., February, 20, 1886.

SIR: In accordance with the verbal request of your committee, I have the honor to submit a brief statement in regard to the estimate made for the support of the insane in this hospital for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

In a letter marked "Appendix Gg" (p. 295, Book of Estimates for 1886-'87) I have estimated that the average number of insane persons admitted to this hospital in accordance with Revised Statutes, sections 4844 and 4850, and under care during the year ending June 30, 1887, will be 581. The annual cost of maintenance, exclusive of repairs, is estimated at $225, which gives the total cost for 581 patients of $130,725. In the same letter I have stated $56,670 as the probable sum that will be appropriated by Congress in the District bill.

Not to make this statement too long, I inclose herewith tabular statements marked A, B, and C, respectively, containing statistics that have been the basis of this estimate.

Granting the correctness of the estimate, the only question would seem to be, why should the sum in the District bill be $56,670 instead of $130,725, the balance of the estimate of $280,000 for support remaining to be provided in the sundry civil bill?

Reference to Table B will show that the amount decided on in the first District bill (that of 1881) was $37,000, and following a somewhat regular ratio of increase each successive year the appropriation has been $40,000, $43,200, $46,700, $50,436, $53,462, and the same ratio for the year now under consideration would give $56,670. If the $37,000 for the year 1881 was an equitable adjustment of the matter, the subsequent appropriations follow as a matter of course. I have no other reason to offer for the somewhat arbitrary figure of $56,670.

Reasons which occur to me as having some weight why the whole sum of $130,725 should not be placed in the District bill are as follows:

Of the 536 hospital inmates from the District January 1, 1886,* 49 were non-resident, admitted under Revised Statutes, section 4850. Now, there is no doubt but the fact that Washington is the seat of the General Government makes it an attraction for "cranks," and that these 49 non-residents, which is a fair average number for the year, except on the ground of common humanity, have no business here.

Of the 536 in the hospital January 1, 1886, the board of 2 of the non-resident and 10 of the resident indigent was paid by friends, and the money has been deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the hospital. This is perhaps a fair average for the year. Obviously these should not be charged to the District, nor have they been in the bills rendered by the hospital, though they necessarily appear in the statement of the whole number admitted from the District.

Again, prior to July 1, 1877, the resident indigent insane were committed by order of the Secretary of the Interior, the authorities of the District having no voice in the matter. Of those thus committed, 163 were remaining January 1, 1886. Some of these drifted here during the war, and the District Commissioners have never allowed that they were a proper charge to the District.

If all the claims are allowed and the deductions made, which would seem to be liberal enough, then instead of 536 we should have 314 as the probable average chargeable to the District for the present fiscal year and 333 for the year ending June 30, 1[illegible].

*I have taken this date rather than the present because it is a fair average of the year.

Also in support of the claim that excessive number of the insane in the hospital are classed as District indigent is the argument drawn from the census of 1880. This census, in which the number of insane in the United States was very carefully taken, shows that the whole number of insane in a total population of 50,155,783 was 91,997, or 1 in every 545 of the population. Of the two States adjoining the District of Columbia, Maryland shows a ratio of 1 to every 503, and Virginia 1 to every 627. Now, assuming that the bona fide population of the District is 200,000 at the present time, which may or may not be an ambitious estimate, the ratio of insane to population here in the District, taking only those borne on the hospital-rolls as belonging to the District, and making no account of the considerable number at large, is one to every 377, a state of things only equaled in Massachusetts, where, according to the census, 1 in every 347 is insane.

From all the data that I can gather, I should say that the average of one in every 545, which is that of the whole United States, was a fair one for this District, and that the insane that would properly be a charge to a population like this would not exceed 370, of which number not more than three hundred would be found at any time under hospital care.

I have thus given all the facts having a bearing on the question, and at the risk of traveling outside of the record, I wish to say that what interests me and the unfortunate insane far more than this District question, is the fact that we have between thirty and forty criminal insane, and no separate, distinct, secure building for their care. Three are sentenced for life, and I have notice of another coming. Is it not a wrong done to the innocent? Is it not a menace to the safety of the community? Can the United States afford to do it?

Respectfully submitted,

W. W. GODDING, Superintendent.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations.

Exhibit A shows the whole amount that has been received from the District of Columbia for the support of the patients admitted to the Government Hospital for the Insane since the opening of that institution up to the close of the last fiscal year. Prior to June 30, 1877, no payment was made for the class of resident indigent insane sent here under Revised Statutes, section 4845. From June 30, 1877, to June 30, 1881, the payments were for the non-resident class and for the resident indigent admitted subsequent to June 30, 1877, in accordance with the act of that year. Since June 30, 1882, the payment has been the amount appropriated in the District bill, covering both the resident and non-resident class.

Exhibit B shows the legislation in different years since 1877 in regard to the proportion of the expense of the insane from the District of Columbia, in the hospital, to be borne by the District. Prior to 1877 there is no legislation on the subject except Revised Statutes, section 4850, which provides for the admission of non-resident insane and the payment of their board by the District authorities.

EXHIBIT B.

Exhibit C is designed to show the proportion that the average number of insane patients from the District has borne to the average total number of inmates under treatment during each year since the appropriation of a specific sum for their support in the District bill. The first section shows the average number during the year. The second section shows the total number of resident and non-resident insane remaining on the last day of each year, including the 1st of January of the present year. Also the total number of patients in the hospital.

EXHIBIT C.

Since the appropriations for the District of Columbia have been made in a distinct bill, the amounts appropriated in that bill for this purpose have been as follows:

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 307) to amend section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to writs of prohibition, &c., reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the Post-Office appropriation bill, providing for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for transportation of the foreign mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4) to permit the owners of certain vessels and the owners or underwriters of cargoes laden thereon to sue the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 894) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay, George M. Clapp, George W. Lawrence, Snowden & Mason, and the executors of Donald McKay, the Atlantic Works, Jeremiah Simeson, and Curtis & Tilden, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that notwithstanding the rule the parties named in the bill may have leave to withdraw their papers from the files. The adverse report is based not upon the merits of the claim (indeed I am about to report a separate bill for one of them favorably), but solely on the ground that the claims are all found in one bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the persons named in the bill just reported by him have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Notwithstanding the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Notwithstanding the rule. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1477) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay and the executors of Donald McKay, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that Calendar number 566, being the bill (S. 851) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to recommit the bill will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask whether that bill is not on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then how can it be taken up in the morning hour under the ruling of the Chair made yesterday?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Virginia objects. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do object, until all the rules govern every Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was proposed to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. The motion is withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion is withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2119) granting an increase of pension to Owen L. McCarty; which was read twice by its tile, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2120) for the relief of Francis Putman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2121) to provide for the construction of Government warehouses and docks at Key West, Fla., in place of those destroyed by fire; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CALL. In introducing the bill I desire to ask the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, if that be the proper committee, to give immediate consideration to it. A destructive fire has destroyed all the public buildings at Key West and nearly the entire city. There are 18,000 or 20,000 people there, a very large majority of whom are out of employment and without the means of subsistence. The work is absolutely needed by the Government, and there is no time for delay. Large shipments are being made there; it is a place where large importations constantly occur, and the necessities of the Government demand that these buildings should be immediately reconstructed. I beg therefore that the committee may at once consider the subject. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 2122) for the relief of John P. Walworth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2123) to confirm certain entries of Kansas Indian trust and diminished reserve lands in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2124) for the relief of Granville H. Mallory, of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 2125) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 2126) for the relief of L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovell, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 2127) for the relief of Jonathan D. Stevenson, of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2128) for the relief of Len-ne-pi-ze-qua, a Miami Indian woman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2129) granting an increase of pension to John W. Wills; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2130) granting an increase of pension to John C. Miles; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 2131) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to timber depredations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2132) granting a pension to Fridoline Glastetter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HEARST introduced a bill (S. 2133) for the relief of the State University of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the papers in the case of John K. Hummer may be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions. The bill was adversely reported, but since that time a considerable amount of additional testimony has been furnished, and under the circumstances I ask that the papers already on file may go to the committee in order to be considered with other new papers which have been presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves; and

A bill (S. 633) to change the name of Uniontown to Anacostia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2239) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War; and

A bill (H. R. 6397) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River flats, in the District of Columbia, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are now in order. [A pause.] If there be none such, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], and objected to. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, as follows:

Resolved, That all matters other than those relating to treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in open session.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. As I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] gave notice that he would call up his resolution this morning, which in effect if passed would accomplish the same purpose, I will make any motion that is proper under the rules to lay mine on the table in order that his may be laid before the Senate, and that he may make such remarks on it as he proposes to submit.

Mr. PLATT. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Virginia. His resolution can just lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Virginia will lie upon the table; and by agreement of the Senate yesterday, as announced by the then presiding officer, the Senator from Connecticut has the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the resolution heretofore submitted by him. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLATT January 29, 1886, and reported adversely from the Committee on Rules February 8, 1886, as follows:

Resolved, That executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session, except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] submitted amendments to the resolution. The resolution will be read as proposed to be modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That executive nominations shall hereafter be considered and acted upon in open session except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate. And so much of section 2, Rule XXXVI, and section 2, Rule XXXVIII, of the Standing Rules of the Senate as conflict with or is inconsistent with the above is to the extent of such inconsistency rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being pending, the Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, this is a political question which I propose to discuss, a political question, but in no sense a question of party politics. It rises above all party politics, and should be discussed upon a higher plane than mere partisan questions are usually discussed. I consider it to be to-day the most needed measure of administrative reform in this Government, and I wish to discuss it from the standpoint of deliberate and dispassionate argument and reason. My opinions in relation to the question have slowly changed, and I have come to-day to feel that the Senate of the United States can engage in no more important business than the change of its rules in respect to the consideration of executive business, especially so far as the business of nominations is concerned.

I desire at the outset to have it understood exactly what this question is and what it is not. It is a simple proposition to change the rule relative to the consideration of executive nominations, so that in the future the rule shall be that they shall be considered in open session, leaving only the exceptional cases to be considered in secret session. The present rules upon this subject I shall read. The first rule which seems to relate to it is Rule XXXV:

On a motion made and seconded to close the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Senator, require secrecy, the Presiding Officer shall direct the galleries to be cleared; and during the discussion of such motion the doors shall remain closed.

My resolution and the amendments which I have proposed do not interfere with this rule. Rule XXXVI, sections 2 and 3, is as follows:

2. When acting upon confidential or executive business the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Principal Legislative Clerk, the Executive Clerk, the Minute and Journal Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy.

3. All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon, shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

Rule XXXVIII, section 2, is as follows:

2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret.

Then, to refer again to Rule XXXVI, in section 4, which I desire to read, and which I cannot read and which no Senator can hear read without a sense of personal degradation, we find the following:

4. Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and to punishment for contempt.

So that if a Senator or an officer shall disclose any remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, or the votes upon the nominations, he is liable to expulsion from this body.

A history of legislative and executive proceedings of the different legislative bodies of the United States is exceedingly interesting, and I must to some extent refer to it in my remarks.

But first I desire to examine these rules so far as they enjoin secrecy. I suppose it is apprehended that this rule which makes a Senator liable to expulsion from this body if he communicates or discloses any of the remarks which have been made in secret session when the confirmation of a nomination is pending, has been a rule from the foundation of the Government, and that when we seek to change the rule we are departing from the well-established practice of the fathers. But that is an entire mistake. The first rule for requiring any secrecy in the matter of executive nominations was passed on the 3d of January, 1820. Up to the 3d of January, 1820, there was no intimation or suggestion in the rules of the Senate that secrecy was enjoined or expected so far as action on nominations was concerned. Whatever of secrecy was implied was implied simply and purely because of the fact that the Senate sat with closed doors; but so far as the rules were concerned no secrecy whatever was enjoined in this respect.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut if up to that period all the proceedings of the Senate were not in secret session?

Mr. PLATT. I will come to that before I get through with this argument, and I think I shall show that the public sentiment of this country compelled the opening of these doors after they had been five years closed in legislative business; and I think I shall show that the same public sentiment now demands that they shall be opened as a rule upon the consideration of executive nominations.

As I said, the first rule in regard to nominations was adopted January 3, 1820. It is to be found in the report of the Senate Committee on Rules, page 34, when, for the first time, the Senate enacted a rule that—

All information or remarks touching or concerning the character or qualifications of any person nominated by the President to office shall be kept secret.

But no penalty, mark you, was attached at that time. No penalty was attached by the rules to any disclosure of the executive proceedings of the Senate until 1844, when the following rule was enacted:

Any officer or member of the Senate convicted of disclosing—for publication any written or printed matter directed by the Senate to be held in confidence shall be liable, if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and in case of a member, to suffer expulsion from the body.

The rule requiring that information and remarks concerning the character and qualification of members had then been in existence for twenty-four years; and yet when the Senate in 1844 proposed to attach a penalty for the disclosure of the secrets of executive session it was expressly confined to the "disclosing for publication any written or printed matter directed by the Senate to be held in confidence," and it was not until 1868 that the present rule, which I have said no Senator can read and no Senator can hear read without a sense of personal degradation, was adopted—March 25, 1868:

Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and to punishment for contempt.

Remarks and information touching the character and qualifications of a candidate having been made secret, of course that rule now applies to such remarks and information.

So it is seen that the departure from the practice of the fathers has been toward the establishment of a rigid iron-bound rule of secrecy, the violation of which is the expulsion of the member. It has been, in my judgment, a departure from the spirit of the fathers, in direct opposition to the will and best interests of the people, and against the general welfare of the Government.

Now what is my resolution? That there may be no mistake about it, I will read it as it will be if the amendment which I have proposed shall be adopted:

Resolved, That executive nominations shall hereafter be considered and acted upon in open session except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate. And so much of section 2, Rule XXXVI, and section 2, Rule XXXVIII, of the Standing Rules of the Senate as conflict with or is inconsistent with the above is to the extent of such inconsistency rescinded.

The objection which I have most frequently heard is the one of which I have spoken, that this practice of sitting with closed doors is of long standing, dates back to the formation of the Constitution and the commencement of the sessions of the Senate, and the inference is that whatever is old is wise and good and should be retained and never departed from. But I have shown that the departure has been in the line of more rigid secrecy and in the line of punishing for a disclosure of the secrets of the Senate, and I have to remind Senators that no great measure of reform in this world has ever made progress that did not make it over the ramparts of custom and tradition.

It seems to me that the answer may be rested on the history of the rule as I have cited it to the Senate. That whatever secrecy was implied from closed doors existed, I admit. It existed from the start. That any more secrecy than is implied by closed doors existed at the time of the commencement of the sessions of the Senate, I deny. That any greater secrecy existed in relation to the consideration of executive business than existed with the consideration of legislative business while the Senate sat with closed doors, I deny. It was not until 1800, eleven years after the Senate commenced its sessions and six years after the doors were opened for legislative business, that any rule of secrecy was applied to any kind of business transacted in executive session. So whatever secrecy the fathers observed for six years after the Senate was opened as to legislative business was the same secrecy with regard to executive business that they had at first adopted with regard to legislative business and no more. I shall endeavor to show by some references to history, as briefly made as I can, that that was not a very rigid kind of secrecy; that even in the Continental Congress, which sat with closed doors, and in the legislative sessions of the Senate, which for the first five years were held with closed doors, there was no rigid secrecy maintained. Members of the House, the newspapers, knew what was being discussed in the legislative sessions of the Senate although the doors were closed.

I have said that the Continental Congress sat with closed doors, but it was early in the history of the Continental Congress that Alexander Hamilton introduced the following motion, to be found on page 52 of Elliott's Debates, fifth volume:

A motion was made by Mr. Hamilton, seconded by Mr. Wilson, that, whereas Congress were desirous that the motives and views of their measures should be known to their constituents in all cases where the public safety would admit, when the subject of finances was under debate the doors of Congress should be open.

Mr. HOAR. What is the date of that?

Mr. PLATT. February, 1783. That was in the Continental Congress, and I call attention to Mr. Hamilton's preamble and I commend it to Senators in the consideration of this resolution:

Whereas Congress—

It is not whereas the people were desirous of knowing what Congress was doing, but—

Whereas Congress were desirous that the motives and views of their measures should be known to their constituents in all cases where the public safety would admit, &c.

That is the doctrine which ought to-day to prevail in the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States ought to desire that their constituency should know what they are doing here and the discussions which take place upon any and all measures which may be before the Senate.

The first Congress was to meet March 4, 1789, but a quorum not assembling, the House of Representatives did not organize until April 1, 1789, and then transacted no business except of a mere formal character. On the 6th of April, 1789, a quorum of the Senate appeared, and, as Senators know, the votes for President and Vice-President were counted. On the 8th of April, two days afterward, the House of Representatives, departing from the custom established, threw open the doors of the House for the transaction of all business, and, except in rare instances of public danger, those doors have never been closed since. John Adams, writing to his wife on the 19th of April, 1789, said:

Before this, I presume, the printers in Boston have inserted in their gazettes the debates of the House of Representatives, which are conducted with open galleries. This measure, by making the debates public, will establish the National Government or break the Confederation. I can conceive of no medium between these extremes.

The Senate did not open its doors, but a resolution to conduct the legislative sessions of the Senate with open doors was introduced very early. The Senate meeting in April, 1789, in the following April, 1790, on the 29th of the month, a resolution for open legislative sessions was offered, as we are told in Maclay's Notes, by the Senators from Virginia. The Senators from Virginia were then William Henry Lee and William Grayson. I desire to correct myself. That motion was not offered by the Senators from Virginia, but was, as Maclay tells us, laid on the table at the instance of the Virginia Senators. Grayson died, and James Monroe succeeded him, and took his seat in November, 1790, and on the 24th of February, 1791, he renewed the motion that the legislative sessions of the Senate should be with open doors. That was debated for two days in the Senate, and was defeated by a vote of 9 to 17. The record of it is to be found in Senate Journal, volume 1, pages 281 to 287.

March 26, 1792, the motion was again renewed by Monroe; it was then defeated by a vote of 8 to 17. April, 1792, the motion was varied, and the motion was then to admit to the discussions in the Senate two persons who might be recommended by each member of the House of Representatives. That was also defeated, 6 to 16.

On the 4th of February, 1793, a resolution was offered, as follows:

Resolved, That the conducting of the legislative and judicial powers of the Senate in public, and suffering an account of their measures and deliberations to be published in the newspapers, is the best means of diffusing general information concerning the principles, motives, and conduct of individual members; and that, by withholding this information, responsibility becomes unavailing, the influence of their constituents over one branch of the Legislature in a great measure annihilated, and the best security which experience has devised against the abuse of power and a maladministration abandoned.

It was negatived by yeas 7, nays 21; but I call the attention of Senators to the language of this resolution, because it is as pertinent in relation to the conduct of ordinary executive business as it was with regard to legislative business. On the same day a motion was made to agree to another resolution, in these words:

Resolved, therefore, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open whilst the Senate shall be sitting in a legislative and judicative capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule shall commence and be enforced on the first day of the next session of Congress.

That resolution got 10 votes in the Senate, and there were 18 against it. So the proposition all the time gained, as the present proposition has all the while gained, and will gain until it shall be adopted.

Then the Senate, on the 11th day of February of that year—very much as we brought into this Senate the discussion of matters which were raised upon the consideration of nominations, by the resolutions of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary—voted without division that the discussion and consideration of the question of whether Albert Gallatin, elected a Senator from Pennsylvania, was qualified for a seat in the Senate (it being objected that he had not been nine years a citizen of the United States), should be with open doors. It was so held; and the result of it was that it being once seen that a question of a legislative character could be discussed with open doors without any prejudice to the public interests, the Senate on the 24th of the same month passed a resolution that at the commencement of the next session the legislative sessions of the Senate should be open and that a gallery should be constructed.

I have referred to this to show how the measure grew from the time when Alexander Hamilton introduced his resolution in the Continental Congress, which received only the affirmative vote of the State of Pennsylvania, to the time when, as Hildreth in his history says, public sentiment compelled the doors of the Senate to be opened when it was sitting in a legislative capacity.

It will be observed that on the same day that this resolution for opening the doors was passed the present rule—the rule which stands to this day, that the Senate should upon the motion of any Senator, seconded by another Senator, close its doors—was enacted. It seems to have been a kind of compromise, something such as is now suggested, that when any matter relating to a nomination comes up which in the judgment of the Senate should be conducted with closed doors, the Senate may by vote order it so to be done.

It is interesting to note a fact of which we are told, that the first motion to conduct the legislative sessions of the Senate with open doors having been laid on the table at the instance of the Senators from Virginia, James Monroe came, at the next session, to the Senate instructed by a vote of the Legislature of Virginia to renew the motion and to press it to a favorable conclusion. I will not stop to refer to the interesting character of that debate, as shown by contemporaneous history. The resolution which I have referred to, of February 4, 1793, shows the line along which it must have been conducted. I think I will make a single reference to Maclay's Notes, pages 296 and 297, for the purpose of showing that the very same arguments were urged against open legislative sessions which are now urged against open executive sessions. The Virginia Senators having mentioned their instructions—

This brought the subject of instructions from the different Legislatures into view—

Which I do not care to refer to. Senator Maclay spoke on the main question. He says:

As to the late conduct of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, I spoke with but few of them. I had no instructions from them, and, all things considered, I was happy that I had given my voice on a former occasion for it.

That was for open session—

The reasons which I gave then operated still in full force on my mind.
The first was: That I knew of no reason for keeping the door of any Legislative Assembly open that did not apply with equal force to us.
The second was: That I thought it a compliment due to the smallest State in the Union to indulge them in such request.
The objections against it—

And I ask Senators to note these objections, because they are the same which are raised to-day in regard to open sessions in executive matters—namely: That the members would make speeches for the gallery and for the public papers, would be the fault of the members. If they waged war in words and oral combats; if they pitted themselves like cocks; or played the gladiator for the amusement of the idle and curious, the fault was theirs. That let who would fill the chairs of the Senate, I hoped discretion would mark their deportment. That they would rise to impart knowledge, and listen to obtain information. That while this line of conduct marked their debates, it was totally immaterial whether thousands attended or there were not a single spectator.

I have said that the rule of secrecy had been very slight, if any. I think there was really none. The only question was whether the public should be permitted to hear the debates, not whether the debates should be communicated by members to persons outside; and the correspondence and contemporaneous writings of that day show that members of the Senate did not hesitate to tell what was said and done in the Senate, and one curious instance I will stop to refer to. Maclay, on page 269, speaking of the vote upon the memorial which had been sent from Pennsylvania to the Senate against the funding of the public debt, which was then under consideration, says:

Mr. Morris—

was the only nay. I was in good humor myself, although I considered the vote of this day as waging a war with the public creditors, in which I will most probably lose my re-election, and was sorry to see my colleague manifest such a degree of peevishness. He left the Senate Chamber immediately after the vote.

Now I want to refer to the writings of Fisher Ames. On the 23d of December, which was the day on which the vote was taken, writing evidently at his seat in the House to Thomas Dwight, of Connecticut, he says:

The creditors in this State have sent us a huffing memorial, which I inclose. It came in when the price of debt affords an answer to it. No notice was taken of it. The Senate, I hear, have proposed to answer them by resolving that a revision of the funding act is improper.

That was in the commencement of his letter. At the end of it he says:

The Senate have just voted, R. Morris only dissenting, in substance as I stated before. I wonder how the petitioners could overcome their Philadelphia modesty so far as to present such a —— memorial. You may fill the blank for yourself.

Showing that Mr. Morris, being the only "nay" in the Senate, took his hat, rushed out of the Senate and rushed into the House, and poured his woes into the ear of Fisher Ames. It is only one of numerous curious instances which show that there was no rule of secrecy, unless it was upon particular matters in which there was a special effort made to keep them secret.

As I have said, there had been no rule of the Senate involving secrecy in any particular. The rules of the Senate were first adopted April 16, 1789, were nineteen in number, and may be found in its Journal, volume 1, page 13. Nothing was said about keeping any of the proceedings, either legislative or executive, secret. The only rule of the Senate in relation to executive nominations adopted prior to December 22, 1800, was adopted on the 21st of August, 1789, and is the rule which is now in force in relation to the conduct of public business when executive nominations are considered. It is to be found in Executive Journal, volume 1, page 19, and is in these words:

Resolved, That when nominations shall be made in writing by the President of the United States to the Senate, a future day shall be assigned, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise, for taking them into consideration. That when the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber, the President of the Senate shall have a chair on the floor, be considered as at the head of the Senate, and his chair shall be assigned to the President of the United States. That when the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the President of the Senate and Senators shall attend at the place appointed. The Secretary of the Senate shall also attend to take the minutes of the Senate.

That all questions shall be put by the President of the Senate, either in the presence or absence of the President of the United States; and Senators shall signify their assent or dissent by answering, viva voce, "ay" or "no."

Is it not remarkable, if any more secrecy were implied as to executive business than as to legislative business, that when they were adopting this first rule for the conduct of executive business there should not have been some mention in it that these proceedings should be kept secret?

It ran on then without any further rule on the subject for six years after the Senate adopted a resolution that the legislative sessions should be open. December 22, 1800, the Senate passed this rule; it is the first rule in the Senate with regard to secrecy, and let us see what it applied to; it did not apply to the consideration of nominations:

Resolved, That all confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the members thereof kept inviolably secret; and that all treaties which may hereafter be laid before the Senate shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

Does some one say the confidential communications included executive nominations? That is shown not to be the case by the occasion on which it was adopted. It was adopted upon the transmission of a message of John Adams, then President, submitting instructions given to the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French Republic in the following words:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In conformity with your request in your resolution of the 19th of this month, I transmit you the instructions given to our late envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French Republic.

It is my request to the Senate that these instructions may be considered in strict confidence, and returned to me as soon as the Senate shall have made all the use of them they may judge necessary.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, December 22, 1800.

If the Senate had been considering all messages sent by the President to the Senate as secret, why did he in the message request them to consider this particular measure in strict confidence? The fact that the rule was adopted in relation to confidential communications on the reception of this message shows plainly the character of the commuications to which it was applied. It was to communications of the character that had just been transmitted to the Senate only—in that case the instructions given to Minister Short to France—and to-day that is what we understand by the term "confidential communications." That was six years, as I said, after open legislative sessions had been adopted. During these six years nominations and confirmations were published daily in the newspapers, or at least every few days.

There are some very curious things to be found in the Executive Journal, if it be said that there was any rigid secrecy maintained in regard to such matters; for instance, on page 149 of the first volume of the Executive Journal I find this:

That the Secretary of the Senate pay no further compensation to the printers for the weekly publication of the journals.

So that in that early day, just about the time that the Senate concluded to hold its legislative sessions with open doors, for some reason or other (and it appears to have been a newspaper warfare) the Secretary of the Senate in executive session was instructed to pay no further compensation to newspapers for the publication of the journals; of course, meaning executive journals.

The most important event that occurred in those days was the nomination of Mr. Jay to be envoy extraordinary of the United States to his Britannic Majesty for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of commerce and amity. It created a good deal of discussion not only in the Senate but in the country, and a reference to the public journals of that day shows that the country understood perfectly well what that discussion was in the Senate. It turned on the question of whether we wanted any treaty with a power with which we had been so recently at war, and whether the negotiations should not in any event be conducted by the then accredited minister to that court; and it turned further upon this public question, whether a gentleman who was then one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be appointed as envoy extraordinary to England to negotiate that treaty without resigning his office upon the bench.

That nomination was confirmed on the 19th day of April, 1794, and on the 21st of April, 1794, two days thereafter, the Senate voted that any member of the Senate might have an extract from the Journal; but we find this very curious circumstance, that on that very 19th day of April, on which Mr. Jay was confirmed as envoy extraordinary, John Adams wrote his wife—to be found in page 156 of his letters—calling his wife, as he does in all of these letters, with touching sentiment, his "dearest friend:"

The Senate has been three days in debate upon the appointment of Mr. Jay to go to London. It has this day been determined in his favor—18 versus 8.

That was before the Senate had allowed any person to take a copy of the proceedings; and under our rule now I understand that John Adams, then Vice-President of the United States, would have been liable to expulsion for writing that to his wife. It shows the difference between former times and the present time.

The most important event of that time following upon the nomination of Jay was the negotiation of the treaty, its return to the United States, and its ratification by the Senate. That treaty, for the first time in the history of the Senate, was received under an injunction of secrecy. It was communicated by George Washington. I will not stop to read the message. It was ordered that the Senators "be under an injunction of secrecy upon the communication this day received from the President of the United States."

That was June 8, 1795, and yet they were holding open legislative sessions, and it is the first indication of a rule of secrecy or of any keeping of secrets to be found in the Executive Journal; and the contemporary historians tell us that great efforts were made to keep that treaty secret. John Adams, in writing to his wife, does not disclose anything about the contents of that treaty, but he says "Mum, mum, mum." He treats it entirely different from the way in which he treated the question of Jay's nomination pending before the Senate.

If it had been the practice to receive everything under an injunction of secrecy, why should there have been a special order made that this treaty should be received under an injunction of secrecy? The treaty was ratified June 24, 1795. The next day many Senators were absent and the injunction of secrecy was removed, but it was reconsidered at the same session and the Secretary was directed to notify the absent Senators. They came in the next day and took the injunction of secrecy off from the proceedings, but specially enjoined that no member of the Senate should divulge a copy of that treaty. There was an effort to maintain secrecy something in the way we do at the present time. What was the result?

Before I come to the result, I want to say this: James Madison, writing when that treaty was under consideration by the Senate to James Monroe, then minister to France, communicated about as good an abstract of the contents of the treaty to James Monroe as he could have done if he had seen the treaty itself; and yet he says the most extraordinary efforts in official quarters have been made to keep it secret and he has got no hint of it whatever from official quarters. But what was the result of this effort to keep the text of the treaty secret? The vote to keep the text of the treaty secret was on the 25th of June, 1795. On the 26th or 27th a really good sketch of the treaty was published in the Aurora, in Philadelphia, where the Senate was then holding its sessions, and on the 29th Mr. Mason, a Senator from Virginia, wrote a note to the editor of the Aurora stating that he had seen a sketch of the treaty, and as he desired that there should be no inaccuracies and the public should understand just what it was, inasmuch as the sketch had been published he sent a copy of the treaty, which he was at liberty to do with as he pleased; and it was published the next day in pamphlet form, and the next day after that in the Daily Advertiser, and it flew all over the country with lightning rapidity. That was the way they used to keep secrets in those days. I refer to it not for the purpose of showing that they violated the injunction of secrecy, but that this was an individual instance where, on account of great considerations relating to the public welfare, an injunction of secrecy was put on in the executive sessions of the Senate. It is curious in this instance to remark, too, that Washington, just a day before the publication of the treaty, at the instance of Senator Mason, had directed it to be published so that the people might not be misinformed about it.

There are plenty of indications, if I could stop to enumerate them, to show that absolute secrecy was not observed or required in reference to executive proceedings, but that the whole matter was left to the judgment of Senators, supposing that when there was any subject the telling of which would go against—as Alexander Hamilton said in his resolution—public safety, then the Senators would have prudence and judgment enough to keep it secret. That was the original idea, and that was the only injunction of secrecy in those early days.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator whether the order for the publication of the Jay treaty was not made for the purpose of eliciting discussion throughout the country in order that members of the Senate might know what disposition to make of that treaty? It certainly did lead to a very extended discussion in Boston, New York, Charleston, and all over the country; very able speeches were made in reference to the provisions of that treaty. I wish to find out from the Senator whether the order for publication was not made in order that the members of the Senate might be informed by their constituents as to the public opinion in reference to the treaty.

Mr. PLATT. I must have been unfortunate in not making myself clear. The injunction of secrecy which was especially ordered by the Senate, and the first injunction of secrecy ever ordered by it in relation to any matter pending before it in executive session, was rigidly observed—rigidly observed both in executive quarters and in the Senate. The greatest efforts were made to do so, and the Senate by vote enjoined that although the proceedings by which it was ratified in the Senate might be made public, no Senator should make the treaty public until after the ratifications had been exchanged by the President. It was in direct violation of that that the treaty was published. It was not till after it had gone through with this discussion in the Senate, where it had been discussed for three weeks in a special called session of the Senate—it was not till after its ratification by the Senate that it leaked out and was published.

I have said that in 1820 a rule was adopted that the remarks and information communicated by a Senator upon the consideration of a nomination should be kept secret; it had been attempted once before, in 1813, in the Senate, and I refer to this because it is particularly important. The records in the Executive Journal are too long for me to read and detain the Senate with. The history of the attempt will be found in Senate Executive Journal, volume 2, pages 374 to 415.

The effort was made in executive session to adopt the very rule that was afterward adopted in 1820, namely, that a Senator should not be permitted to divulge remarks or information communicated by a Senator upon the consideration of executive nominations. It failed signally. It went through all the forms of reference and report, and finally was dropped. So in 1813 the attempt was made to enjoin secrecy and failed, and it was not until 1820 that the Senate succeeded in adopting any rule of secrecy applicable to what was said in executive session with regard to nominations. The fact that it failed in 1813 shows that it was not the rule or the practice at that time. This binding the Senate down by an iron rule of secrecy with regard to what is said respecting the character and qualifications of a person nominated to office is a recent matter.

But, Mr. President, I must not encumber the RECORD with more citations from the Executive Journal—which is an interesting book, if Senators will study it—upon this subject. I have only alluded to one or two things as illustrating my proposition, but I wish before I come to the more practical and argumentative part of my remarks to enumerate hurriedly the efforts that have been made in open session of the Senate to do away with this rule.

Much of the history of this subject is contained in the Executive Journals of the Senate since 1829. Up to that date the Executive Journals were published by order of the Senate, but since that date they are kept secret, no one other than Senators, the officers of the Senate sworn to secrecy, and the President may know the history of the country contained in those secret books, and if I refer to it I am liable to expulsion. But I may refer to what has been done in legislative session.

On February 20, 1841, Senator William Allen, of Ohio, introduced a resolution for open sessions. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the other day in the discussion of the question of the production of papers by the Executive referred to this Senator as "Uncle Billy Allen," and I take it it was not a term of reproach, but a term rather of endearment. Certainly he was a Senator representing the great State of Ohio, and he introduced this resolution:

Resolved, That the fortieth rule for conducting business in the Senate, and which requires the Senate to close its doors when in executive business, be rescinded, except as to the action of the Senate on treaties.

That was laid on the table by a vote of 26 to 20. It was laid on the table, I have no doubt, to cut off discussion; but the fact that 20 to 26 Senators in that day voted to not lay it on the table shows that it had some strength and support even as far back as 1841. Senator Allen never got an opportunity to discuss that again in open Senate. He renewed it at every session of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him if there was anything like a party vote appearing in that case?

Mr. PLATT. I think not.

Mr. ALLISON. No party division?

Mr. PLATT. I think not, but here are the yeas and nays; the Senator can tell from them. I have not examined them to see:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Talmadge, and Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—20.

Senator Allen renewed his resolution again at the next session, February 23, 1842. No opportunity was given to discuss it then. A motion to go into executive session cut off the debate.

Then again he renewed it December 28, 1843. He renewed it again February 23, 1848, and it was again laid on the table by a decided vote, 39 to 13, probably an unfortunate time to press its consideration. I give the yeas and nays:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashley, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Downs, Felch, Greene, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Moor, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Sevier, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Webster, and Yulee—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bright, Clayton, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Douglas, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, and Turney—13.

At the special session in 1853 Senator Chase, of Ohio, introduced the following resolution, thus supplementing the effort of his predecessor, Senator Allen:

Resolved, That all sessions and all proceedings of the Senate shall be public and open, except when matters communicated in confidence by the President shall be received and considered, and in such other cases as the Senate by resolution from time to time shall specially order; and so much of the thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, and fortieth rules as may be inconsistent with this rule is hereby rescinded.

That resolution was discussed at some length. It was supported by Senators Chase, Borland of Arkansas, and Sumner, the predecessor of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, from whose speech I desire to read a single quotation:

At the first organization of the Government the proceedings of the Senate, whether in legislation or on treaties or on nominations, were with closed doors. In this respect the legislative business and executive business were conducted alike. This continued down to the second session of the Third Congress, in 1794, when, in pursuance of a formal resolution, the galleries were allowed to be opened so long as the Senate were engaged in their legislative capacity, unless in such cases as might, in the opinion of the Senate, require secrecy; and this rule has continued ever since. Here was an exercise of the discretion of the Senate in obvious harmony with public sentiment and the spirit of our institutions.

The change now proposed goes still further. It opens the doors on all occasions, whether legislative or executive, except when specially ordered otherwise. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] says that the Senate is a confidential body, and should be ready to receive confidential communications from the President. But this will still be the case if we adopt the resolution now under consideration. The limitation proposed seems ample for all exigencies, while the general rule will be publicity. The executive sessions with closed doors, shrouded from the public gaze and public criticism, constitute an exceptional part of our system, too much in harmony with the proceedings of other governments less liberal in character. The genius of our institutions requires publicity. The ancient Roman who bade his architect so to construct his house that his guests and all that he did could be seen by the world is a fit model for the American people.

Let me also quote a single sentence from the speech of Senator Chase especially pertinent to the proposition now under consideration. It will be noticed that his resolution provided for open sessions upon the consideration of treaties as well as nominations. After speaking of the propriety of considering treaties in open session as a rule, he went on to say:

So many and indeed almost all nominations are confirmed or rejected upon principles of public or party policy, without reference to private character, that I see no reason why debates and votes upon these should not be public. Whenever any questions involving moral character are raised, it will be in the power of any committee or any member to move that the doors be closed.

The resolution went over after debate, and as the session adjourned in two days thereafter no action was taken.

Then at the following session of Congress Mr. Chase renewed his resolution. It was laid on the table without discussion, at the instance of Senator Mason, by a vote of 23 to 14. I give the yeas and nays:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Butler, Cass, Cooper, Dawson, Dixon, Evans, Everett, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Sebastian, Shields, Smith, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Toucey—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Gwin, Hamlin, Norris, Pettit, Slidell, Sumner, Wade, Walker, Weller, and Williams—14.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-third Congress, page 240.

The discussion of the subject came up in the Senate upon the resolution of Mr. Wade, submitted January 21, 1862, asking for a joint rule for legislative secret sessions upon important matters touching the conduct of the war. In that discussion the question of secret sessions was pretty thoroughly discussed. I will not stop now to refer to the discussion, because I see that I am consuming altogether more time than I had intended, and because I may wish to quote some extracts therefrom upon another point further on in my remarks.

To leave now the historical argument—and I think the practice of the fathers shows that it will be no very great departure from the principle which governed them if we should open the doors for the discussion of such nominations and such only as we think may properly be discussed with due regard to the public safety—leaving that branch of the argument, I wish to come to more practical considerations; I wish to answer some of the other objections which are pressed against the proposition.

And here, Mr. President, I take my stand on the proposition enunciated by you on the 9th day of February last, when you said with great terseness and vigor and condensation of thought, "There ought to be no secrets whatever in this Government of ours, a government of the people." It comprehends the whole question. There is but one, and there can be but one, possible limitation to that proposition, and that is an absolute necessity for secrecy.

And now I propose to examine this question to see whether any such absolute necessity exists, and I believe that to all fair-minded Senators I can demonstrate that there is no such absolute necessity existing; and if I do, then I ask their assent to this proposition: that unless that absolute necessity can be shown, unless public safety, public welfare demand it, no consideration of convenience to a Senator and no desire or disinclination on the part of a Senator to evade responsibility of any kind whatever should lead him to give his vote for the continuance of the practice longer.

Secrecy is odious to every human being in this world except when he practices it himself. It is against the spirit of a free government. I said it was odious. Whenever you see secrecy you are suspicious that something is wrong. It is a relic of monarchical power and privilege that has no business in this day of democratic tendencies when we seek to make this Government even more actually democratic than it was expected to be by its founders. It is a lineal descendant of the privy council, that has always been hated in this country. We demand that the President shall have no secrets from us. Why? We think that if he has secrets there is something that ought to be disclosed, that what is done in secret should be proclaimed on the house-tops. Secrecy is as odious to us as it is to others when the President insists upon practicing it. But what do the people say to us? They say, You demand that the President shall have no secrets from the Senate. We demand that the Senate shall have no secrets from the people. How are we to get away from the inexorable logic of that statement on the part of the people?

Mr. President, publicity is the cure of all evils, whether they be governmental or financial or social. Publicity is the one thing upon which we must most rely in this country for the correction of evils. Why do we investigate matters? We order here and in the other House investigation after investigation because we think something is done in secret which ought to be revealed. We believe when we get the slightest inkling of anything which has been concocted in secret that something is wrong—that it is the duty of each branch of Congress to turn on the lights, and the people sustain us in it. Usually when that which was done in secret is dragged out into the light we find that something wrong has actually been done. It is as true now as it was eighteen centuries ago that "men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil."

Now, I want to marshal for a moment the arguments which have been made in favor of secret sessions; and the first is this: The argument has always been made, it was made in the discussions to which I have referred, that open sessions will deter Senators from frankly and freely communicating what they know when bad men are nominated, and therefore objectionable men will be confirmed. Well, we have tried the secret system for one hundred years, and do not bad men get confirmed now? And when we see that the secrecy system does not work, that it does not improve the standard of our civil service, is it not worth while to try the other course and see whether publicity will not improve it? I admit that the consideration of a nomination in open session may involve some unpleasant duties for Senators; but is this Senatorial life a bed of roses? Has it no unpleasant duties and no unpleasant consequences? To imagine it to be a bed of roses requires all the imagination and stoicism of Guatemozin when he was stretched on his bed of torture. We have no such difficulty in relation to other matters involving the discussion of character. We have no difficulty in expressing our opinion with regard to individuals when they come up here in a way that brings them before the open sessions of the Senate. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], in the able speech he made the other day, did not have any hesitation in telling us what he thought about the appointments that had been made in the State of Indiana; and yet when every one of those appointments are considered by the Senate the doors must be closed, because the Senator from Indiana cannot tell without unpleasant consequences to himself what he thinks and what he knows about the men who are nominated for office there.

Even the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] finds no difficulty, when he desires to do it, to discuss the character of men nominated and appointed to office in open sessions of the Senate. I turn to the trenchant speech recently made by that Senator and read:

The postmaster at Sioux City, Iowa, was convicted and sentenced in Dakota for violation of the pension laws.

* * * * * * *

In Rhode Island a Democratic postmaster was appointed who had been in the preceding three months arrested nine times for violation of the liquor law.

And so on, giving the names of the officers and what they had been arrested for. He finds no difficulty in doing that. We had a discussion here recently on the educational bill, and what did the Senator from Kansas do? He discussed openly in the open Senate a nomination then pending before the Senate in executive session—the nomination of Zach. Montgomery to be Assistant Attorney-General for the Interior Department. Every word that he said was directly relevant and proper to be said in executive session on the consideration of that nomination; yet was there any trouble about it? Did the heavens fall? Was it unpleasant to the Senator? Was it unpleasant to anybody else?

Take another illustration. Take the applications that we have here for restoration to the Army of people who have been dismissed from the service. Is there ever any hesitation or shrinking on account of its being unpleasant for a Senator to say what he thinks about the men? I have here in my hand a quantity of reports where the whole record of the man is spread out on the records of the Senate. Some Senators seem to be more troubled with the idea that it would be unpleasant, not to produce the bad record of a man, but unpleasant to say those things about a man which would perhaps wound his feelings, when he is really a very good man, except that he is not calculated for or adapted to the office. But here in one case General Sherman accepts a man's dismissal for utter worthlessness, and yet there was a proposition to restore him to the Army discussed. I will not take time in referring to more of these.

One answer to that argument is that bad men will not be presented here for discussion; the incompetent will not be presented here for us to discuss as they are now presented, if it be understood that their characters and qualifications are open to public discussion, and are to receive public consideration. The whole business of appointing men to office will change. We shall have fewer recommendations of bad men, fewer nominations of bad men, fewer confirmations of bad men, if publicity can attend the whole business of office-seeking and office-getting from the White House to the Senate.

I want also to say this in reply to that argument: It may undoubtedly be pleasanter to say a harsh thing, or an unkind thing, or an unpleasant thing behind a man's back rather than to say it before his face; but is it fairer to say it? In justice and decency and fair play, ought we not to say with respect to any man nominated here before the public and the world just what we would say about him behind these closed doors? I think we had; but we shall have less frequent opportunity or occasion to say it if these doors are open. How rarely it is now that a Senator is called upon to say an unpleasant thing here with regard to a person who is nominated for office who is otherwise a good man, a man whose feelings they do not want to wound, whose sensibilities they do not want to hurt.

What Senator can remember the time when in executive session such things have required to be said about any man? If we have those cases where a Senator does not really want to wound the sensibilities of a candidate the rule which I desire the adoption of still permits our going into executive session with closed doors; but do Senators think they enjoy exemption as it is now? Do you think that the man whom a Senator talks about here does not know what that Senator says about him? If he is rejected, he knows that he is rejected for cause; he knows that he is rejected because his Senator has not stood by him probably, and he surmises ten times as much as he would if that Senator's conduct and every word he said had been made public and open to the world. So this argument falls to the ground by its own weight. The consequences are more unpleasant now than they would be to take the responsibility in open session.

Let us test this argument a little more closely. A good many of us are lawyers. Do we hesitate to say in open court, when we are paid for it, what we think about the character of witnesses and parties in a cause? Not at all. No lawyer ever flinches from that duty. Why should we seek to flinch from it here? We are paid to do our duty here as elsewhere, and why should we flinch from doing it any more than in court?

But, again, we have popular elections. Every four years a man is nominated for President, and from one end of the land to the other his whole character is discussed before the people. Senators go upon the stump; they say what they think about each candidate; his past record is dragged to light; every foible of his life is paraded; the whole question of his character and qualifications is everywhere discussed with the utmost publicity, and why should we seek to shield ourselves behind closed doors when persons are nominated to office by the President when we never think of desiring to shield ourselves or evade the responsibility of saying what we think about the President himself when he is nominated for office?

So judges and governors are elected, governors by the people and judges sometimes by the people and sometimes by Legislatures, elected openly, their characters canvassed openly. If a person thinks they are good men, nice men, but will not make good judges, he says it, and he says it openly. He is never deterred by any consideration that he will wound anybody's feelings from expressing what he thinks when a President is nominated, when a governor is to be elected, when judges are to be elected, or even a justice of the peace is to be elected. Why, then, should we become so nervous when we are asked to tell what we think about the character and qualifications of a man who is nominated for office by the President instead of by a convention? We ourselves are nominated and elected in open Legislatures, where our characters are discussed, where our qualifications are considered, and our whole history is brought to light and arguments made pro and con. If a member of the Legislature thinks we are fair men for some positions, but not for the Senate, does he ever forego the expression of that belief from the fear of wounding our tender susceptibilities?

Mr. President, we have election contests here sometimes. Look at the book which has been compiled by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, study the cases which have been discussed here with regard to the admission and the expulson of members when questions of bribery to secure election, charges involving moral character, have been made against Senators and against the mode of their election, has there ever been any shutting of the doors to the investigation of those questions and to the discussion of such issues from the fear of wounding a Senator's feelings? They have been investigated in open daylight, they have been discussed in open Senate, and you could no more have shut the Senate doors upon such discussions than you could shut them upon all legislative questions. Yet it is just as unpleasant for a Senator to say what he thinks about a person who has been certified as elected to the Senate, about his conduct and about the charges against him, as it is to say it with regard to the nomination of a man here. Take one noted case. My eye being on the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] now brings it to my mind. For years and years there has been discussed here in open session the conduct of Fitz-John Porter, and that Senator has not hesitated to say boldly, openly, in the hearing of the whole world, what he thought about that gentleman who is seeking to be restored to the Army; and when the bill passes, if it does pass, and when the President nominates him to be a colonel, if he ever does, then these doors must be shut in order to consider whether we shall confirm him or not. Then the character and conduct of Fitz-John Porter must be discussed in secret.

Sir, this argument becomes something farcical when you look it in the eye. What is the essence of it? It is a plea for personal privilege on the part of Senators; it is a plea to be exempt from unpleasant duties. I like to be exempt from unpleasant duties, but I do not want to plead that, and I do not believe any Senator wants to plead that, when such exemption from public duty militates against the public welfare.

I want to say one thing more in reply to this argument. I have not been here as long as a good many Senators, but I have been here some years now. I affirm now that I never have heard a word said in executive session which ought to have been said there, or which any person thought ought to have been said there, which might not just as well and just as appropriately have been said in open session in relation to the confirmation of nominations.

But another argument is that we shall consume a great deal of time and encumber the RECORD. If that argument is good, we had better go back to the days of secret legislative sessions. That was an argument used against opening the doors in legislative session; and if all debates were secret and we had no RECORD, and what a man said was not published in the RECORD, possibly we could get along with business a little more rapidly. Will we go back to secret legislative sessions on that account? If not, it is no argument against open executive sessions provided it be for the public welfare and the public interests that they shall be held. It is inconsistent with the last argument. The two cannot stand together.

Again, another objection I have heard is that there will be cases where public policy and the conservation of the public morals require that they shall be discussed in secret session. Whoever heard of such a case? Whoever heard of a case discussed in secret session of the Senate that might not have been discussed openly and everything relating to it be published openly, without any prejudice to the public morals? It applies with much more force to cases in court than it does in the Senate; and yet no Senator here will stand up and say that the doors of the courts in this year 1886 shall be closed against any testimony in any case whatever. I think myself that the publication of very much which is done in court tends to debauch the public morals; but public sentiment is so far in favor of publicity and no secrecy that it will not permit, and it is right that it should not permit, the doors of the courts to be closed even in cases where the details having a tendency to prejudice public morals are under discussion.

But it is said that there is a distinction between the capacity in which we act in executive matters and in which we act in legislative matters, and that in this distinction, in this difference between our duty as legislators and our duty in confirming or rejecting officers, lies the real reason why we ought to act with closed doors. I admit that in a sense we are a part of the executive power; but when we thus act, exercising that duty and that function, we are still Senators, and the crucial test is this: if we are free from responsibility to the people when we act on the confirmation of nominees, when we discharge that portion of our duties which is executive, then I agree that it is quite proper to close the doors; but if we are Senators still, if we are responsible to the people for our trust, if we ought to report to the people how we discharge that trust, then the distinction which is sought to be drawn between our legislative and our executive functions falls entirely to the ground. I apprehend that we are Senators still, that we represent somebody still, that we are not beyond responsibility, that we are not beyond accountability for our trust, when we act in the matter of the confirmation of officers. The administration of law is involved in the confirmation of officers. The whole question of administration, whether the Government shall be well administered or poorly administered, is involved in the question of what officers are appointed and what officers are confirmed; and it is as important that the people should know in this regard and for this reason how officers are appointed as it is that they should know how the laws are made.

I want to read from the report made by Garrett Davis, upon the Sylvester case in relation to secrecy. It was a part of the report of the Judiciary Committee in the discussion on the power of the President to withhold papers:

Why should there be any secrecy in these matters?—

That is, in relation to removal from office—

Secrecy is not an element of our system—its great and fundamental law is public opinion; and how can this be wisely and justly formed when the facts which are necessary to enlighten it are concealed as "state secrets?" It is only falsehood and corruption, wrong and oppression, that are sought to be wrapped in darkness; the officer who means and acts well dreads not the sunlight. There may be rare cases where secrecy in the removal of public officers would promote the public good; but the mischief and immorality inseparable from such a system will preponderate a thousand fold.

It is doubly applicable to the matter of confirming officers rather than to their removal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business at this hour, being the resolution reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], from the Committee on Foreign Relations, February 3, 1886.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be laid aside informally until the Senator from Connecticut concludes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the unfinished business will be laid aside informally until the Senator from Connecticut concludes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I thank the Senate. I will conclude without consuming very much more of the time of the Senate.

Is there any other argument than those which I have examined why we should continue these secret sessions? Yes, I have heard one other—that it is a Senatorial prerogative which it is wise for us to maintain. I do not want to stop to discuss that question; but I believe that right in that argument, perhaps, is the greatest disinclination which some Senators may have to the opening of these doors; but I desire to say just this: there are two words which the people want to see expunged from the political vocabulary of this country, and it is time they were obsolete. Those words are "prerogative" and "privilege." If it were not for being alliterative I would say there are two more words they desire to see expunged, and those are "patronage" and "perquisites." The people desire to have done with them and we had better have done with them. This is no place to assert prerogative. We had better stand pretty close to the people and trust the people if we want them to trust us.

But I must do more than answer objections, Mr. President; I must take the affirmative. I say, then, we must do this thing in self-defense, as Senators and as a Senate.

This is not a popular body, either in the political or colloquial sense of the term; indeed, I have come to the conclusion that it is fast coming to be a very unpopular body in the estimation of the citizens of this country. Some Senators will say it never was intended to be a popular body; some Senators will say now, as was said in the constitutional convention, that here should be a body constituted with a long term to be elected not by the people but by the States, to be removed from direct responsibility to the people, in order that they might check the tendencies to democratic extravagances; some men may say now, as they said then, that it was well to mold one branch of this Legislature somewhat upon that branch of the English Parliament known as the House of Lords. Such seems to have been the idea of Senator Butler in the discussion in the Senate on the Chase resolution in 1853. I quote from Senator Butler's remarks (Appendix Congressional Globe, Thirty-second Congress, second session, page 321):

This is not a pure democracy. If the Government of the United States was an undisguised and simple democracy, perhaps the gentlemen might well insist upon a resolution of this kind. They might make the Senate the arena for the discussion of every subject, as was done in Athens, or in democracies where the people directly had a vote. But we are a confederacy of organized republics, and we live under a Constitution—a Constitution by whose obligations I feel bound, as well as the usages under it.

But this Government was formed a century ago. The men who framed it made a theoretical democracy, but there were anomalies in that Government which they so founded, and the Senate is one of them. They were theoretical democrats, but they were far from being actual democrats; and whoever observes the signs of the times in this year will see that the day, not of theoretical democracy, but of actual democracy, is hastening on to its accomplishment and completion. Whoever looks abroad, whoever notices what is going on in all civilized countries, cannot fail to see the great ground-swell which is to lift the people of the world into more active and close participation in the affairs of government. It is well we should not shut our eyes to it; it is well to get away from this idea that we do not represent the people, that we represent the States.

What are the States we are sent to represent? Can you disconnect the States from the people of the States? By no means. The people are the States; and when it is said that a Senator represents here the State and is not directly responsible to the people, that is only a fiction; it is only a nominal representation. Our real responsibility is to the people of the State that we represent. What do I mean? Do I mean that the Senate is to be influenced by public clamor? No; I think I have as much courage to withstand public clamor as perhaps any Senator. I do not mean to be influenced by public clamor; but when I believe that public sentiment with great unanimity demands a thing I am going to be very careful to draw the distinction between that public sentiment and public clamor and not mistake the will of the people deliberately formed for public clamor.

No, Mr. President, the idea that we can set ourselves up above the people, not let the people know what we are doing, is not in accordance with the spirit of the age. This world has come to believe in the philosophy of the Divine Master: "And whosoever of you will be the chiefest shall be servant of all." That is what a Senator must be. As the President and the governor and every other officer within the body-politic, he must be the servant of the people.

This means popular information and scrutiny of all governmental proceedings; it means better government; it means better administration; it means the abolition of all exclusiveness, of privilege, of prerogative, of aristocratic tendencies. For better or for worse, that day has come. The people are to be omnipotent in government.

What has this to do with secret sessions, says some one. The people believe that this Senate is aristocratic, that it holds itself above them, and does not consider itself responsible to them. I do not like to make that statement, but I believe it to be just and proper that I should make it because I believe that to a large extent, to a much larger extent than Senators suppose, it is the view which the people have of this body; that we intend here to maintain aristocratic privilege; that we intend here to maintain secret prerogative; that we intend here to put ourselves above responsibility to the people. In this, Mr. President, the people are largely mistaken. They misunderstand us; they misunderstand the character and desires of Sentors; but, notwithstanding, that is their belief, and nothing has done so much to create that belief and perpetuate it as the fact that we close these doors when we consider nominations to office. It is just because the Senate, from habit and custom, from a disposition not to depart from what are supposed to be the good old ways, maintain certain things, and among them this matter of secret sessions, that the people think we have set ourselves above them.

The popular sentiment, Mr. President, is for open executive sessions with regard to nominations as a rule. It is not public clamor; it is real, true, and genuine popular sentiment. How is popular sentiment reflected in this country except by the press? I venture to say that of the nearly fourteen thousand newspapers in the land probably ten thousand of them, political or independent—a very large proportion of them—have declared their belief that this measure should be adopted. I am met by some Senator by saying that he does not care what the press says, that an issue has been raised between the press and the Senate, and he is not going to be influenced by any such consideration as that. I desire to say here one or two very frank words. With that journalism which concedes to public men neither honest motive nor private virtue I have no sympathy and for it no respect. It is a malignant kind of journalism which I cannot respect and which all right-minded men must condemn. But that is not the true character of the public press of this country as a whole. The country newspapers, the newspapers that have no special correspondents here, are all against these secret sessions. All over this land, without regard to section, these country newspapers, which represent the real sentiment of the country, which go where the minister and the schoolmaster do not enter, and where the voice of the Senate does not otherwise go, have declared in favor of this measure; the men who publish those newspapers think of our Government, they study public questions a great deal more than we suppose, and the fact that there is but one voice in the press shows where public sentiment is on this subject. Public sentiment compelled open legislative sessions of the Senate, and it now demands open executive sessions of the Senate.

Whence arises this demand? It is not idle curiosity. It is not that a few reporters may look in on these proceedings and send the news to the journals which they represent. Oh, no; that is not it. It is the desire of the people for a better administration of the Government. It is a desire of the people that the standard of official life and character shall be elevated; and they know the only way to do it is by having the qualifications of men discussed openly in the Senate Chamber.

I should like to read extracts from newspapers, but I will content myself with reading one. I read it from a Democratic paper in my own State, a conservative paper, a paper that does not mean to misrepresent Senators or the Senate. It is from the New Haven Register:

But it is in the confirmatory powers of both the national and State senates that the evil of the secret-session system most clearly discloses itself. Many an unworthy public official is imposed upon the community by the Senate to please the whim and caprice of "a brother Senator" because the responsibility for his confirmation can not be fixed. Whereas if the country only knew what Senators indorsed the nominations of this class of servants, not one of them would dare vote for a confirmation. Moreover, the secret session encourages a disreputable class of politicians to seek public office. They know that whatever their faults are, they will not be held up to the contemplation of the country. They are sure to have "a pull" with either their own or some other fellow's Senator, which a secret session will permit to be worked for all it is worth in bargains and trades. The results are that the responsibility for bad officials is hopelessly divided, and bad officials get into office.

Pardon a single other extract from among thousands. It is from the New York Independent:

There is no good and sufficient reason why these sessions should be secret and the action of the Senate should be known to the people only in the result. Secrecy gives an opportunity for bargains between Senators and bargains between the President and Senators in respect to appointments to office, that would not exist to anything like the same extent if the sessions were open and the general public permitted to see all that is done. Both the President and the Senate, with open sessions, would act under a sense of responsibility—the one in making nominations, and the other in acting upon them—that would be favorable to the best interests of the civil service of the country. Both would be influenced by the fact that the eye of the public is upon them.

These extracts from conservative newspapers show what the sentiment is in regard to the way we conduct business here. I want to say the press in this respect is largely mistaken; but you cannot eradicate that idea from the public mind.

But there is another argument, which is also an argument of self-defense. I have said that secrecy begets suspicion. Go to a dinner party, to any social gathering, and see two persons whispering together, and you think they are saying something which they ought not to say, and probably about yourself. Secrecy begets suspicion; and it is only human nature which the public are exemplifying when they believe that something wrong is done behind these doors in the way of bargains and trades and arrangements by which men are confirmed to office.

I say no Senator can afford to expose himself to any such suspicion. Every Senator knows it exists. Every Senator knows that very largely through this country the idea is that we bargain with each other about confirmations, or that we confirm nominees out of good nature, or that through some idea of Senatorial courtesy we fail to oppose men whom we ought to oppose or favor men whom we ought not to favor. Every Senator knows it, and I for one do not want to endure it. I do not want it longer to exist. A poet said:

O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!

I wish Senators would try to exercise that gift. I wish they would try to understand how they are regarded in this respect, what the people think of the way in which we conduct business here in the secret sessions of the Senate, and the motives which influence us in the confirmation of persons to office. I agree, I am glad to testify, that it is a great mistake in the popular mind; but as I said, you cannot eradicate it. No record for honesty, no record of an honorable life, no record which a man has made of pure motives and pure intentions exempts or excuses him from this belief on the part of the people. If you doubt it, ride in the cars, in any public vehicle, listen to the conversation along the streets, hear what motives are attributed to Senators who we know are honorable by people in ordinary conversation. If there were no other argument but this in favor of open sessions I should insist upon it that the people might know what my motives were in regard to the confirmation or rejection of men.

But Mr. President, there is no secrecy. We are hugging an old custom for its name rather than for its actual results. We are pinning the Senate to the skirts of an ancient tradition which, as to any useful result, is sterile and barren. There is no secrecy possible. There never has been any secrecy possible in any matter about which the public desired information that took place in executive session. I do not say how much or how little, or whether any at all, of the reports which we see from day to day in the newspapers published after each executive session is true, but I think I am justified, without revealing any secrets of executive session, without doing what the Senator from Vermont intimated in his colloquy the other day with the Senator from Kentucky, was done—violating a Senatorial oath and becoming guilty of Senatorial perjury—I believe I may say that the secrets of this body are to a greater or less degree exposed and disclosed. Mixed they may be with untruth, mixed they may be with the fertile imagination of the newspaper reporter, nevertheless no Senator will deny me in saying that more or less of what occurs in executive session is disclosed. It is disclosed either by Senators or by the officers of the Senate, and when I say that I do not mean to cast the slightest suspicion upon the officers of the Senate. I do not want to be in a body where I am subjected to the suspicion of dishonorable disclosure. We are a class here, as lawyers, as clergymen, as bank presidents, and as business men are a class; and when one does a thing that is discreditable we all suffer.

I repeat, there is no secrecy possible with regard to the executive sessions as to those matters which the public want to know. Let me refer, as I have referred, to the Jay treaty. I refer to the treaty of Washington. I shall not stop to dwell upon it. I refer to the case of the Spanish treaty. I hold in my hand three pamphlets, International Awards and Arbitrations, by George Ticknor Curtis, a reply by Mr. Foster, and another reply by Mr. Curtis. They all tell the public that there is a treaty pending here, and in what they say of the treaty they give extracts from it, and yet if there is a treaty pending here to-day known as the Weil and La Abra treaty I may not say so, and I may not say one word in relation to it without incurring the degrading punishment of being expelled from the Senate.

Let me quote from the discussion in the Senate in 1862 upon the Wade resolution, to which I have alluded. Mr. Foster, a Senator from my own State, said:

Mr. President, I am not disposed to oppose the adoption of this joint rule, but I must be permitted to express my great doubts as to our acting in secret with efficiency. I do not believe that secrecy is an element of power in our Government. I believe it is an element of weakness, decidedly. We have at the present time what are facetiously called secret sessions of the Senate; and sir, what is done in secret session, or what is reported to be done is brought before the eye of the public I think rather earlier and more minutely than what is done in open session. I do not say that it is correctly reported, but it is so reported that the public give it credit; and if it is false it is more likely to do harm than though the truth were reported. I do not see, therefore, that we gain by attempting to conceal our transactions from the public eye. I am not disposed, however, to enlarge upon that topic. I am perfectly willing to accord with the Senate in passing the rule if it is deemed best to do so.—Congressional Globe, Thirty-seventh Congress, second session, part I, page 491.

Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, said, speaking of a clause providing for expulsion in case of disclosure:

That is the rule now, sir, for punishing the disclosure of what occurs in the executive sessions of the Senate; and what have we seen since this session began? Why, sir, we have seen published nearly everything that has occurred in executive session; and the rule which the Senator now proposes to adopt to prevent it is no more stringent than the present rule of the Senate. I should hope, if this rule be adopted, that we shall be able to keep our secrets, and that the punishment prescribed by the rules would be inflicted upon the violators of them. I wish that punishment could be inflicted upon the violators of the rule during the present session of Congress in this respect. We have hardly had an executive session, certainly not one where there has been any discussion or any question dividing the body, that nearly everything that has transpired has not been published the next day to the world—published with exaggeration, published with misrepresentations, placing members in a false position. I would infinitely prefer that our regular reporters should be here and publish what we do say and how we act than that these garbled accounts should go out to the public to create bad feeling in the country. I do not know that we have any assurance that this new rule will be better observed than the present rule is; but if it is adopted, I hope it will be.

I do not mean to oppose the adoption of a rule to go into secret session for the purpose indicated by the chairman of the War Committee. I want to see greater harmony between the different Departments of the Government, closer connection between them, each bolstering up the other, and that we may go along hand in hand to put down this rebellion in the shortest possible time. Therefore, reluctant as I am to vote for a resolution imposing secrecy upon ourselves, I shall consent to this if it can be modified so as not to place the body absolutely at the disposal of a single member.—Congressional Globe, Thirty-seventh Congress, second session, part I, pages 491, 492.

What a farce it is, Mr. President. The whole community, the world, are laughing at us that we pretend to have secret sessions. We ourselves would be infinitely better off if every word that is said here were known to the remotest portion of the globe than with the pretended publications of what we do and say mixed up with the imagination of reporters and the untruthfulness which accompanies the reports.

There is nothing left to us but silent endurance when we are misrepresented. I could name matters in which to-day my people suppose that I have voted one way because it has been so stated in the newspapers and I voted the other way. I have nothing left to do but to endure and to submit to the misrepresentation, because I cannot disclose what my vote was or the motive which led me to give it unless I can get the injunction of secrecy removed; and that goes, as every Senator knows, as a matter of courtesy very often, to a particular Senator. The public believes these disclosures.

But there is another reason why we should make the discussion of nominations open, and that is because the discussion of the question whether an officer nominated to the Senate shall be confirmed or not often involves the most critical and important policy of the Government. We have had an instance within the last few days in the discussion as to the right of the President to withhold papers upon the consideration of nominations. It was so important as to be taken out of the secret business of the Senate and made the matter of a public discussion. Why? Because it involved a principle. So almost every nomination here that does not go as a matter of course involves a principle of administration, a policy of administration, a policy of government. Take a few instances:

Take Jay's nomination. Take the removals for political reasons in 1835, when Marcy uttered that famous sentence that "they agree to the rule that to the victors belong the spoils of the enemy." That was in secret session. It arose in secret session upon the question of the confirmation of a nomination. For a knowledge of that important discussion we are indebted to the fact of the removal of the injunction of secrecy in the particular instance, so that Senators might, by publication of their speeches, let the country know what was said in secret session. They were afterward written out and published, and thus only we get the information. A great many matters of great public importance have been discussed in secret sessions upon the consideration of nominations that have never gone to the public; the seal of secrecy has never been removed from them. I have heard speeches made in the Senate in secret session which ought to be in every school-book in the land, and yet they are sealed by that rule which makes me liable to expulsion if I disclose them.

Without enlarging upon such cases, I instance the nomination of ministers to the Panama congress; the nomination of directors for the United States Bank; the Kearny nomination, where Mr. Benton, as Senator Hale said in the discussion of this subject in 1853 (I suppose he alludes to him), discussed that nomination for three weeks in executive session. It turned upon the policy of the government of the Territory of New Mexico while under a military governor. Take the case of Burnett now pending; take the case where we confirmed a man nominated to office only a few days ago, the case of Judge Merrick. I ask Senators who were in executive session that day whether it would not be better for this whole people that every word which was said on that occasion should be spread upon the record—whether important principles were not discussed which the people ought to know about.

I have alluded to these instances only to show that except in the cases which go without contradiction, or the very few contested cases which arise upon the record of the candidate, almost all of these nominations involve some important principle of the administration of the Government. What occasion is there for concealment? We hear frequently about the policy of the President. Where is the policy of a President shown more than in the class, the character, the tone of the men whom he nominates for office? The nomination of an Indian commissioner may involve our whole Indian policy; the nomination of a postmaster may involve the whole policy of civil-service reform; and that leads me, Mr. President, to my concluding proposition:

We never shall have a real, thorough reform of our civil service until the widest possible publicity is given to the methods of Presidential nominations and Senatorial confirmation. This thing has been going from bad to worse during the hundred years that we have closed up these doors, and the people have become more or less aroused on this subject. They do not believe that the methods of seeking office, of getting office, of making nominations and confirming men to office, are calculated to inure to the welfare of this Government, and they want a change. They think they have a right to know by what means men secure nominations and obtain confirmation. They want to know how it is done and why it is done—and they are right.

What is the principle underlying the idea of civil-service reform? I want to say that I believe in that principle. It is that fitness and good character shall be the real primary tests and qualifications for office. Nay, more than that; not only that the man shall be fit and good but that he shall be the fittest and best man obtainable for the office. That is the principle of civil-service reform, and it has no limitations to men who discharge mere clerical duties. It applies to all officers, to the heads of Departments, to Senators, to members of the House, to every man who is nominated by the President, and comes before this body for confirmation. The best government is only attainable by the appointment of the fittest and best men. Negative fitness and goodness will not do in this respect. We must have absolute fitness and absolute goodness in the character of our officers or the whole system of republican institutions is in danger.

What was the abuse which has aroused the people in this respect? The abuse was that offices were bestowed as rewards for political service, or adherence to the fortunes of men who could manage appointments; that patronage controlled appointments. That is the reason why men have become earnest in this matter of civil-service reform. How was that carried on? It was carried on by the solicitation of politicians to the appointing power, by recommendations from politicians to the appointing power, by nominations secured by such solicitations, persistent solicitations by politicians, by Senators and Representatives who should act only in a legislative capacity. That was the way it was possible; solicitation privately made, patronage privately dispensed, confirmations secretly accomplished. These are the things which have aroused the people, and Senators know that I speak the truth when I say it.

Has it ceased, Mr. President? In this discussion I exclude the question whether officers should be changed when a political administration is changed. Admit that or deny it, the reason for open executive sessions is still the same. If the office-holders are to be taken from one political party because that party is in power, you still want to get the best and the fittest men in that party, and it is only thus that you can secure the best government by that party.

It is a mockery to speak of civil-service reform as accomplished because some fifteen thousand mere clerks are appointed by competitive examinations and are not liable to be discharged on the change of an administration. We confirm between three and four thousand men in the Senate, not including military and naval officers, any one of whom has ten, twenty, nay, fifty times the political influence of any clerk who is appointed under the civil-service rules, and how are these men appointed? Go stand on the steps of the White House; see who goes there. Go stand within the library of the President; see how he is persistently approached and solicited to appoint men to office.

I wish to put in a table, which I have obtained as approximately correct from one of the Civil-Service Commissioners, showing the number of persons whom we confirm here to political offices:

Memorandum of officers whose appointment is by nomination and confirmation.

Department of State:
Department officers	3

Whole number requiring confirmation		3,561

Whole number of civil employés, about 110,000; of these, 52,632 are postmasters. Places subject to civil-service examination, about 15,000, namely, Departments at Washington, 6,000; postal, 6,000; customs, 3,000.

Is it possible for a President, no matter how good his intention, how strong his desire may be, to select for officers the best and most capable men even from the ranks of his own party until the present methods are done away with? Until there shall be some degree of publicity attending the procuring of nominations, until the President shall be in some degree relieved from the solicitations to which he is subjected, until we speak openly in regard to the character of men who get nominations and the official standard of the service to which such men are appointed, this thing will go on. It is a farce and a mockery and a delusion to talk about civil-service reform as an accomplished fact while this goes on.

There is no party consideration in this; either party will be advantaged and neither party can be hurt by the adoption of this resolution. Is patronage no longer known? Can President Cleveland select the best qualified men while the country knows that recommendations are to be hidden and confirmations are to be surrounded by secrecy?

How then is civil service to achieve its ultimate triumph? One road, and one road only, leads to the goal of its perfect success. That road passes through those open doors. Give to the people every opportunity to scrutinize the means, the influence, by which men obtain nominations to office, the causes for which incumbents are removed, the methods by which confirmations or rejections are secured.

While the Senate holds the President to his promised transaction of the business of selection of officials behind glass doors, let it, in the language of Senator Sumner, imitate the example of "the ancient Roman who bade his architect so construct his house that his guests and all that he did could be seen by the world." Then the whole scene will be changed; the man whose character cannot stand public scrutiny either at the Executive Mansion or in the Senate Chamber will no longer be a candidate for appointment, or if a candidate he will be an unsuccessful one; offices will then in truth begin to seek the man, for it will be useless for the man to unduly seek the office. Office-holding will, as it should in a free government, become honorable and honored. Bestow the offices as publicly as possible. Let all the people know why and how they are bestowed, and they will see to it that the standard of official life is raised to its highest plane. Still surround the bestowal of office with concealment, with mystery, with secrecy, and the standard of official life will inevitably sink to its lowest level.

Mr. President, this Senate Chamber, constructed as it is to exclude the joyous sunlight and the pure air of heaven, is the most fitting place in which to conduct this business of secretly considering nominations to office. Here the sunlight never enters; here we may never breathe the pure air of heaven; here we languish and sicken and eventually die; here every vital physical and mental energy is impaired if not paralyzed. While we remain we must live in a dungeon.

This Chamber is an architectural failure—I had almost said an architectural outrage; but it has its fair complement in the way we conduct the business here regarding nominations. That conduct is a political failure; it is fast coming to be a political outrage. We can not change the construction of this Chamber, but we can change our method of doing our executive business. Do we wish to restore our political health? Do we desire a new lease of political and beneficent life? Then these doors must be opened. We must let in the light. The "keen, bright sunlight of publicity" must illumine our transactions; we must breathe in the pure and vitalizing atmosphere of popular responsibility.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, I will state that to-morrow after the morning business I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks on the resolution to which the Senator from Connecticut has addressed his speech to-day. I suppose it is scarcely worth while to get unanimous consent, although I believe that is usually done.

Mr. LOGAN. If there be no objection, it is all right.

Mr. FRYE. If the fisheries resolutions should not be disposed of within half an hour or something of that kind to-day, I should like to have it disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. After the Senator from South Carolina is through with his remarks I shall ask that I may be permitted to occupy the remainder of the time; and if he takes all the time to-morrow I shall then call up the resolution the day after in the morning hour with a view to submit a few remarks upon the question which has been under consideration this morning.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6397) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RETURN OF PRIVATE PROPERTY IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The bill (H. R. 2239) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the chairman of that committee, is very familiar with that bill, and I should like to have it put on its passage without a reference. I feel sure there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The unfinished business is the resolution in charge of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. FRYE. If this leads to no discussion, I shall yield.

Mr. BUTLER. It will not lead to one particle of discussion, I am sure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read at length.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state for the information of the Senate that a similar bill was reported by the Committee on Finance of the Senate at this session.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it the same as the bill we passed last year?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; it has been passed twice in the Senate. It is simply to restore some old pieces of silver, some boxes in the Treasury Department, to the owners.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to it if it is the bill we passed last year.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the bill we passed last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to the proper claimants or owners, any silverware, jewelry, portraits, watches, or other articles deposited in June, 1869, in the Treasury of the United States by the Secretary of War, as property captured by the United States Army during the late war, and now in the possession of the United States Treasury; also any property of like character received at the Treasury Department from General Ketchum under instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That in all cases proof satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury be made by the said claimants of the ownership and identification of the said silverware, jewelry, portraits, watches, or other articles.

SEC. 2. That all of the aforesaid articles which may remain in the United States Treasury one year after the passage of this act shall be advertised in not less than six newspapers, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all of said articles which may remain in the United States Treasury two years after the passage of this act shall be duly advertised and sold at public auction, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and the net proceeds thereof be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that this bill is identical with one reported from the Committee on Finance in February with the single exception of the clause relating to any like property from General Ketchum. I understand from the Senator from South Carolina that there is an additional box of like property in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true; some pieces of silver.

Mr. MORRILL. If that is all, I see no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report, the Chair is informed. The bill comes from the House of Representatives, and there is no report of the Senate committee.

Mr. CONGER. If there is no report, I wish to ask whether there is any statement as to the kind of property.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state for the information of the Senator exactly what the character of the property is.

Mr. CONGER. What I wanted to ask was whether there was any list or schedule identifying the kind of property?

Mr. BUTLER. The bill provides for its identification under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. There are two boxes, put there in 1869, I think, captured by General Sherman's troops coming through the State of South Carolina. I got a special bill through the Senate once to deliver to Mr. Macrae certain articles, specifying what they were. I went there with him to the Treasury; the boxes were opened; and among other things there was a miniature of his father, who had been a major in the British service. The old gentleman was very much affected by it; but the Secretary of the Treasury would not deliver the miniature because it had not been specified in the bill, whereupon I introduced a bill covering all the articles. There are some articles of silver, old watches and silverware, really of no great value, but it has been the source of a great deal of annoyance and trouble to me by people entitled to the articles writing to know if they could not get them. The bill is simply to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to restore those articles to the owners upon their being identified under such rules as he may prescribe, and it further prescribes that at the expiration of two years the articles not claimed shall be sold at public auction.

Mr. CONGER. On the face of the bill there seems to be nothing very objectionable to it. There is a clause in the bill which speaks of "any property of like character," and the question might arise whether captured and abandoned property of the identical character would be included.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a box of old silver. The term "like property" refers to another box. I do not know exactly what is in it, but watches, spoons, silver, &c.

Mr. CONGER. The pictures, photographs, and daguerreotypes, and those kind of things I suppose have value only to the family and ought to be returned.

Mr. BUTLER. That is about the only value I see.

Mr. CONGER. If there was any statement in regard to the quantity or quality, the amount, or anything of that kind that the Senate could act upon, I think it would be very proper that the bill should pass; but with no report and a bill so general, I do not know exactly what the Government proposes to give up.

Mr. BUTLER. I can give my own individual statement, which I have given. I have seen the articles and the boxes, and I have stated their general character. Of course, if the Senator does not take that, he must do just as he sees fit about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the bill (S. 1118) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the bill (S. 851) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It requires some further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill indicated by him be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate now resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the resolution relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. FRYE. Two or three very distinguished Senators are to address the Senate on the resolution, whose word as to law will be regarded by the country as law, and therefore I wish to call their attention to one or two matters, so that they may discuss them.

The discussion already in Canada and here has had a good deal of effect. Canada started out with a declaration that our vessels had no rights in their waters except those of hospitality. She has since modified that, by admitting that they have a right to ship crews there, and according to Consul-General Phelan, at Halifax, the further right to land cargoes at the port of entry and transship them across the country in bond, and the further right according to the same authority to lie at any port as long as they please, the Canadians exercising police duty over them. The Secretary of State of the United States has assumed to-day the position which I was very greatly in hopes he would assume, entirely different from that which he assumed some weeks ago in his telegram to Captain Whitten, of Portland. The Secretary of State received a dispatch April 9, 1886, which I shall read, and his reply thereto:

PORTLAND, April 9, 1886.

To Hon. Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.:

Having several fishing vessels ready for the Banks, we desire to know if they can enter Canadian ports for men and be protected in so doing.

CUSHING & McKENNEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1886.

To Cushing & McKenney, Portland, Me.:

The question of the right of American vessels engaged in fishing on the high seas or entering the Canadian ports for the purpose of shipping crews may possibly involve construction of treaty with Great Britain. I expect to attain such an understanding as will relieve our fishermen from all doubt or risk, in the exercise of the ordinary commercial privileges in friendly ports, to which, under existing laws of both countries, I consider their citizens to be mutually entitled free from molestations.

T. F. BAYARD.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of Senators, and especially the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], to that treaty about which a construction may be required. It is the treaty of 1818. It is that provision which says:

And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, that the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays.

For rights of hospitality—I do not use the language—"and for no other purpose whatever." Canada claims that that phrase "no other purpose whatever" means precisely that you shall have no longer commercial privileges there for a fisherman. I ask the Senator from Alabama in considering this question to look at the laws of 1823 and of 1830, the proclamation of 1830, the acts of the Parliament of Great Britain, the act of the Parliament of 1849, and the act of the United States of 1849, wherein commercial privileges have been conferred by law upon our vessels, and all of our vessels, and to the additional fact that in 1818, when that treaty was made, there was no such thing as a commercial privilege known to our treaties, and it was utterly unknown to the commissioners who negotiated that treaty. When they put that language in it could not by implication be referred to commercial privileges, because such things were absolutely unknown between us and Great Britain.

Now, I call the attention especially of the Senator from Alabama to another thing. A fishing vessel licensed to fish can not be permitted to enjoy the ordinary commercial privileges granted to other vessels. Under our law character is given to our vessels in two ways—one registry, the other enrollment. Under the early law of 1792 or 1793, a registered vessel alone was permitted to engage in foreign trade, and an enrolled vessel was confined to the coastwise trade. But that was simply a matter of law, and we could just as well have provided by law then that enrolled vessels should engage in foreign trade and registered vessels in the coastwise trade as to provide as we did; or we might provide to-day by law that no vessel of the United States should be required to have anything but a register. That is the law of Great Britain, and we could require the same to-day by our law. We can give an enrolled vessel to-day the privileges of the foreign trade by law.

I call the attention of the Senate to this, that neither Great Britain nor Canada has any sort of right to question what we do touching these rights conferred upon our vessels. They are not permitted to call them in question. The only question is whether those vessels have been armed and equipped by our law for foreign trade; and if they have that must content Great Britain.

I call the attention of the Senate now to section 4318 of the Revised Statutes:

Any vessel of the United States navigating the waters on the northern, northeastern, and nothwestern frontiers, otherwise than by sea, shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as other vessels; such enrollment and license shall authorize any such vessel to be employed either in the coasting or foreign trade on such frontiers, and no certificate of register shall be required for vessels so employed. Such vessel shall be, in every other respect, liable to the regulations and penalties relating to registered and licensed vessels.

There by law we have taken a whole class of enrolled vessels on the great lakes and have conferred on them the right to trade in foreign ports, and nobody in Canada ever dreamed of questioning the right of those vessels to trade with Canadian ports. The moment the act of 1849 opened all those ports they were entirely free and open to that law which was passed in 1864. It is the law of the land to-day, and from that day to this enrolled vessels on the lakes have been engaged in foreign trade. Now, I call attention to another section, 4364, of the Revised Statutes. Here is where I plant myself, on this section of the Statutes:

SEC. 4364. Whenever any vessel, licensed for carrying on the fishery, is intended to touch and trade at any foreign port, it shall be the duty of the master or owner to obtain permission for that purpose from the collector of the district where such vessel may be, previous to her departure, and the master of every such vessel shall deliver like manifests, and make like entries, both of the vessel and of the merchandise on board, within the same time, and under the same penalty, as are by law provided for vessels of the United States arriving from a foreign port.

So that we have by law conferred upon fishing vessels the same rights to trade in foreign ports that we conferred on those vessels on the great lakes, and all that the fisherman has to do is to go to the collector for a permit, and when he is armed with a permit to touch and trade, that fishing vessel, in my opinion, is just as much entitled to free entry into the ports of Canada or the ports of Great Britain as a registered vessel.

I call these points to the attention of Senators, because upon them rests this whole practical question. The only question left to-day between us and Canada is whether or not we shall be permitted to buy bait or ice. That is important to us. Canada sees its importance. She uses it as a lever to pry open our market; but I contend we have it now, and all that a fishing vessel has to do is to take out her permit, and she has the right to buy all the bait and ice she pleases. If that is maintained, it is all we have to ask. The telegram of the Secretary of State intimates that that is his opinion.

One word more. I want to call the attention of the fishing vessels of the country to the absolute necessity, if they would be safe and secure, of taking from the collector whenever they sail a permit to touch and trade.

Now, Mr. President, I yield with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, my difficulty in the discussion of the questions which have been mooted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] arises mainly from the fact that there is nothing before the Senate upon which any definite judgment of the Senate can be taken in regard to these matters. The President of the United States, for the purpose of a temporary arrangement with the British Government after the expiration of the treaty of Washington of 1871, entered into a certain agreement with that government of rather an original nature, the object of which appears to have been and was intended to prevent any collision between the people of British America and the people of the United States in the exercise of their commercial rights or of their fishing rights. The termination of that treaty in the middle of the fishing season, about the 1st of July of last year, was considered by a number of the fishermen on the northeastern coast, as well as by other persons and also by the British authorities, as presenting a rather dangerous category; that men in the attempt to execute rights they had obtained under the treaty of Washington might be drawn into collision and the governments thereby involved in strife with each other. Whether these apprehensions were fully justified by the facts or not, they were honestly entertained on both sides, for the British minister brought this subject to the attention of our Government as one that might lead to some unpleasant complications. Our Government responded, and assured the British Government that it had no authority to create a treaty, no authority to renew an arrangement, but that the executive heads of the two governments could unite for the time being and by common consent not to exert themselves in the enforcement of the demands that might be made by their people on either side; and that led the President to make the recommendation to the Congress of the United States which I will read:

In the interest of good neighborhood and of the commercial intercourse of adjacent communities, the question of the North American fisheries is one of much importance. Following out the intimation given by me when the extensory arrangement above described was negotiated, I recommend that the Congress provide for the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be respectively represented, charged with the consideration and settlement, upon a just, equitable, and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two governments and their respective citizens on the coasts of the United States and British North America. The fishing interests being intimately related to other general questions dependent upon contiguity and intercourse, consideration thereof, in all their equities, might also properly come within the purview of such a commission, and the fullest latitude of expression on both sides should be permitted.

In listening to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, and also in what investigation I have been able to give this subject, I am unable to ascertain that there is really any unsettled question between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the fisheries of the northeastern coast. I have inquired of Senators who have had long experience in the diplomatic affairs of the country, to ascertain, if I could, whether there was any open question of damages, any claim of damages arising between the Governments respectively out of any supposed breach of our fisheries treaties or our fisheries laws; and I can hear nothing of that kind. The Halifax Commission seems to have settled for good and all every controversy, sounding in damages at least, which has been promoted or urged by the citizens of the countries on either side.

Those considerations out of view, the next question would be whether there is any want of certainty in our treaty relations with Great Britain upon this subject. I conceive that there is no want of certainty in our treaty relations, and there is scarcely room for a difference in interpretation of what our treaty relations actually are. The two treaties which have settled the actual and what we might term the permanent rights of the people of the United States and of the Dominion country in regard to the fisheries are the treaties of 1783 and 1818. No other treaties we have made at all in respect to the fisheries have undertaken to define the permanent, enduring rights either of the British people or of our people in respect of the fisheries. We have had two other treaties on this subject, the treaty of 1854 and the treaty of 1871, but they were both temporary in their character and both made liable to be suspended by the action of either government after they had run for ten years, and both have been abrogated. So that the field is entirely clear in respect of the actual state of treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain, and those treaty relations rest upon the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

Now, the question arises, of course, whether the treaty of 1783 has been entirely superseded by the treaty of 1818, and I believe that the better opinion of the publicists and of those who have been officially connected with the discussion of this subject, on our side at least, is that all the rights we acquired under the treaty of 1783 were repeated in a different form in the treaty of 1818; and when we wish to know what are the real treaty rights of the people of the United States in respect of these fisheries we go to that treaty and to no other place. Perhaps, to make this proposition a little clearer, it is better that I should read from these two treaties the text to see exactly what the modification has been. I will premise, however, by drawing attention to the fact that the Colonies before their separation from the British Crown were sister communities, all under the same dominion, members of the same great realm, and the rights of the Colonies were mutual and reciprocal in respect to the subject of the fisheries and a great many other questions. Throughout the whole extent of the British possessions in America there was no distinction between persons who held fishery rights in Canada and persons who held fishery rights in South Carolina or Georgia. It was a common inheritance of right in which they all participated equally and in respect to which there was neither distinction nor discrimination.

I read from the treaty of 1783:

It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland—

"Continue to enjoy." That means that they had, before that time, as colonies, been in the full enjoyment of, and this plenary right was merely continued under the third article of the treaty of 1783; and it goes on—

also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea, where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish—

A sort of common-law right that belonged to the Colonies was put into operation, and continued, notwithstanding the severance of a portion of the Colonies from the British Crown—and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island); and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

That was all that was said about it. A broader right of fishery than that can not be conceived of; no restriction or restraint upon it at all, except that in conducting their business they should not trespass or intrude on private property on the shore in drawing their fish or mending their nets or whatever other use they might have for the shore.

Some controversies arose—it is not at all necessary to refer to the character of them or the description of them or the subjects involved—in regard to this treaty, what the privileges of the people of the different countries might be under it; but the war of 1812 supervened, and after the declaration of peace this subject was again taken up, and the British Government acted upon the hypothesis or theory that all treaty rights which had been secured to us before that time had been abrogated by the war, and that it required a reinstatement of all the fundamental rights as well as of all the commercial privileges we might thereafter enjoy, by some express agreement between the two countries. So our diplomatists went to work to revamp the treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain. Various treaties were signed in rapid succession. In 1814, in 1815, in 1817, and in 1818 treaties were formed. The latest of these treaties, until we get down to 1822, related almost exclusively to the subject of the fisheries. We took the subject up de novo, and in that treaty of 1818 we yielded certain very important rights which I have just called to the attention of the Senate, and we had parceled out to us some other rights in perpetuity. I will call attention to Article I of that treaty to show exactly what we yielded and what we retained; we did not gain anything.

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland.

That appears to be a grant in perpetuity.

From the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company.

All these rights were granted to us in perpetuity on that boundary, that definition of the limit—

And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

That was what was granted to us, or rather it was what was left of our rights under the treaty of 1783. Now comes the part that we yielded:

And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

That I consider the treaty foundation in regard to the fisheries between the United States and Great Britain. It seems to me a very clear one. I can scarcely understand how it is the subject of misconstruction or misunderstanding at all. It will be observed that in this proviso the language employed and the evident purpose of it was to extend to our fishermen a peculiar privilege in the bays, harbors, inlets, and creeks into which they might resort, in favor of our fishermen. There is nothing in that article which I have just read to indicate that the fishermen of the United States were considered in any sense a piratical people or a people who were intruding upon the rights of the people of the British-American provinces; that their traffic was in any sense an unlawful traffic or injurious to the people with whom we traded. On the contrary, this very privilege and license of entering into their bays was given to us for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the people along the cost of the British possessions. Here it is seen now that we have a very large area, commencing at the point I have just mentioned and running by the lines I have read, reaching indefinitely north along and through the Straits of Belle Isle and along the coast of Labrador, where it was supposed then, and where it is true now, that there are immense and very valuable fisheries. That was left to us in perpetuity. We renounced, however, the liberty that we had enjoyed theretofore to take and dry and cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, not included in the former exception, in the other part of the Dominion.

Then for the purpose of encouraging our traffic with them, of encouraging us to go in there and do all such dealing with them as was necessary for carrying on a fishing adventure, this proviso was put into the treaty. It was a privilege given to our fishing ships that was not then enjoyed by any of our commercial ships. At the date of that treaty it was the settled policy of Great Britain, enforced with great vigor and care, that we should not have any direct trade with her British-American provinces. She intended to monopolize that trade entirely for Great Britain, and we were excluded from that trade by the greatest possible diligence. The first relaxation that was ever made in the British policy in respect of our trade with her colonies was with the East India colonies, and then after a while they made a relaxation in favor of the West India colonies, and finally they made a relaxation in favor of the British North American possessions; but never by treaty with us. We have no engagement, as the Senator from Maine well said the other day, with Great Britain in respect of our traffic with the people of the British possessions considered as such.

In 1818, the time this fundamental and last real treaty was made between the United States and Great Britain about the fisheries, our vessels of commerce that were not fishing-vessels had no right to resort there, had no right to go there, had no right to enter for the purpose of any traffic whatever with the people of the Dominion of Canada or the people of the British possessions; but our fishermen had the right to go there by the express terms of the treaty. They had the right to go there then for certain purposes and certain restricted purposes; that is to say, "we give you a very large liberty of coming in here, not a universal commercial privilege, for we do not intend to extend that to your people, but because you are fishermen and because your traffic is beneficial to our coast, because you come here to take our bait"—they did not have any ice to sell then, I believe—"because you come here to get your supplies from our people, because you run in here for the purpose of shelter, we intend to extend to you certain privileges; the only qualification we make is that you shall not do anything while you are in there for the purpose of taking fish, drying, or curing fish."

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I want to ask if the Senator's construction of that proviso is quite as broad as he has just stated, and whether under it all American fishermen are not excluded from the bays, harbors, &c., except for four purposes—shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water? And then does not the last clause, "and for no other purpose whatever," negative any idea that there was any privilege to take bait or to carry on a general trading venture?

Mr. MORGAN. At that time it did certainly negative the idea of carrying on a trading venture, carrying on general commerce with that people in 1818.

Mr. GRAY. I call the Senator's attention to the force of the last clause, "and for no other purpose whatever."

Mr. MORGAN. I have that in my mind. I repeat that this was a privilege guaranteed to our fishermen as one of the benefits of the concession which we made in giving up the rights we had under the treaty of 1783, and it was a right that no commercial vessel of the United States at that time enjoyed, for no commercial vessel of the United States at that time could enter a Canadian harbor for any purpose, unless it might be driven in by stress of weather and might throw itself on the general hospitality of the people under the laws of nations; but there was no legislative right to go there guaranteed to us by the Government of Great Britain, there was no treaty provision, and therefore we had nothing to go on.

I will express the conviction again that this proviso in the treaty was a large indulgence to our fishermen far beyond that enjoyed by any of the commercial vessels of the United States, and was so intended. It was a restrictive advantage, I grant you, but still the only one that was enjoyed by any class of vessels of the United States at that time.

As I remarked before, afterward the policy of Great Britain changed and she began to open up the trade of her colonies to us; first the East Indies, then the West Indies, and after a while she came around and opened up her North American possessions to us for general traffic.

That was done entirely by statute, various enactments moving on the general line until the final enactment, made at a time almost contemporaneous with our laws on the same subject, opened the ports of the British possessions in America freely to our ships of commerce, our vessels of every kind. Those statutes do not discriminate against fishermen, nor do they discriminate in favor of vessels engaged in commerce other than fishing vessels. It is a broad, sweeping statute of Great Britain, admitting our vessels of whatever kind or character freely into those ports, whereupon, or at least almost contemporaneously with it, we passed a law of a similar character permitting British vessels to come here. Every vessel of the United States is included in that privilege granted by British law, without exception and without qualification. Every vessel that has a register or an enrollment under the flag of the United States, and that has papers which authorize that ship to go to sea for traffic, is a vessel that may go into any Canadian port to do anything that any other ship may do there.

The treaty of 1818 is totally perverted, in its application to this state of the case. A certain class of the provincial lawyers seem to assume that the treaty of 1818 gives to the fishremen the only rights they have got, and because those rights are restricted in the treaty therefore they can not do anything except what the treaty itself conferred upon them the power to do, when the fact is that the British statute, making no discrimination against them at all, permits them to go in equally with all the vessels of commerce of every kind and character that go into their ports.

Now, why should we take a class of vessels that in the treaty of 1818 had this great beneficial arrangement made in their favor, a class of vessels that were encouraged to trade in the British possessions, and when a general law is passed, without any discrimination against them, you presume to hold that that class of vessels, which were originally favored and have never met with disfavor at all, are excluded from the effects of this law because there was a treaty in 1818, in which they got a certain privilege or favor in advance of the rights of commercial ships? This reverses the whole theory of proper construction of the existing arrangements between the Government of the United States and Great Britain. The question between us and the British Government is whether or not they have any law that excludes a fishing ship from their ports. They have no law that excludes a fishing ship from their ports; they have not put it into any statute. If they had done any such thing as that, their fishermen would not have been buying fish-bait and recruiting their crews and getting their supplies, everything of that kind, in our harbors. We passed a law for the purpose of conferring upon the British people an equivalent in right to that which they had conferred upon our fishermen. Their own people construed their law by coming here. They are here every day. They are in the ports of the Northeast to-day buying their bait and their supplies and trafficking with our people at will and pleasure.

The treaty of 1818 is to be construed always in respect of the law as it stood at the time of its adoption, as well the laws of the United States as the laws of Great Britain; but when both governments place all the vessels of each country upon entirely a different footing and do not denounce the fishing vessels of either country, and when the people go on and practice upon that legislation, having perfect freedom of intercourse, the one set of people with the other, they have no right to turn around now and say, "In 1818 you were excluded from coming for any other purpose than for shelter and for wood and water." We say that might have been in 1818, and a commercial ship at that time was excluded for all things; but now, in 1886, we find under your laws that we have the privilege of going there, because our statutes have given to your people the privilege of coming here. That is the situation, and it is impossible to get back to the treaty of 1818 as a limitation upon the right of an American fisherman to go into British waters, unless we here intend to undo by some concessions we are about to make the whole effect of the British statutes giving us the privilege of going there.

Mr. GRAY. What has been the practice under the act of Parliament in regard to fishing vessels?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not prepared to say exactly what the practice under the act of Parliament has been, for the reason that nearly the whole period of time since 1818 or a large portion of the period of time since the passage of our several parallel systems of statute law has been covered by special arrangements—the treaties of 1854 and 1871 which have regulated in a different form altogether the fishery rights of the two countries admitting us to free fishing privileges within the 3-mile limit, and in the bays, harbors, gulfs, and so on.

Mr. GRAY. What I was getting at was whether there had been any practical construction by any department of the two governments of the effect of the laws on the fishermen.

Mr. MORGAN. I can cite instances I think in which there was action on the question. The Government of Newfoundland enacted some laws prohibitory of our people and which were considered as violative of the general commercial policy of the Government of Great Britain in respect to our fishing vessels, and that Government refused to give its sanction to those laws, and, therefore, they fell. What I meant to say with regard to the precedent that may be drawn from actual practice is that the fact had been that a very large portion of the time since questions of this character arose has been covered by the two conventions I have spoken of, each of which put the fishing rights of the American people and also of the British people in our waters on grounds of a peculiar character, taking them out of the operation of the ordinary laws of commercial intercourse, but giving us and giving them mutually certain privileges that did not belong to the nations of the world at large, certain privileges within what might be called the inland seas of these different countries. So I have not attempted, nor do I think any person can justly attempt to settle this question at all upon precedent, for these conventions came in to interrupt the course of precedent as far as the law is concerned.

But every day a precedent is being made. The British people have not any doubt at all of their right to come here with any ship of commerce, whether a fisherman or what not, and go into Boston Harbor or Gloucester or anywhere else and trade fully and freely for anything they wish to buy in that market. They are just as welcome there as our own ships; they have as much liberty of action as our own ships. They construe the law every day as authorizing their ships to come into our ports. We construe it in the same way by going to their ports. Occasionally we meet with some impediment, some obstruction, but we find from the remarks of the Senator from Maine and certain information that is given us to-day that they are rapidly relaxing their obstructions and objections and coming to the true interpretation of this matter.

I do not think any sound-minded British lawyer can contend that acts relating to commerce passed years and years after the treaty of 1818 are to be construed by reference to the language of that treaty. The rights of the American fishermen are not left to be controlled by the treaty of 1818, because an American fisherman that has his enrollment or has his registry and his trading license is a ship of commerce and has a right to go to any place in the world where the American flag can float, and because he is on a fishing mission he certainly is not a pirate, he certainly does not endanger the peace, he does not threaten any harm to any person, and there would be no reason for discriminating against him and excluding him from the benefits of British legislation that authorizes our ships of commerce to go into British ports, whether colonial or otherwise, for traffic as well as for shelter, wood, and water. And when we get to that proposition the whole case is answered, because if we can go in there to buy a barrel of flour or a barrel of sugar or one hundred pounds of lard or bacon, we can for any purpose. We can not fish within the 3-mile limit any more, except north of that point which has been fixed by perpetual grant to us under the treaty of 1818. Our people are not claiming it at all. But south of that point we go in for the purpose, not of fishing, and not under any claim of right to fish, but we go in for commerce. While our ships are there, whether they are commercial ships, or whether they are fishermen, they are prohibited from fishing in those waters. Suppose that a steam-yacht were to run into any port in the British possessions and happen to have a harpoon on the yacht and a yawl-boat, and all the necessary equipment happened to be there for the purpose of whaling, some amateur perhaps, and they find a whale in one of those harbors and they harpoon him. They violate the law not because they take the harpoon, rope, and tackle into the harbor, but because they use them there in violation of law. Suppose you have got a seine purse-net upon a ship that you intend to send off fishing on the southern banks of Newfoundland or any of the islands we are permitted to fish about under the first article of the treaty of 1818. You go into port with all the tackle and apparel and furniture necessary for a fishing outfit, and your purpose is to fish. If while you are within the 3-mile limit you do not use your tackle, your seine, and do not fish or attempt to fish, you do not violate the treaty of 1818, nor do you deny any British right. You go there and get your supplies in a commercial ship, intending to go back to the Banks of Newfoundland, and there to equip a fleet, if you please, of fishermen who are ready to cast their nets into the sea for mackerel, or their lines into the sea for cod or for halibut. That is no violation of any law of Great Britain, and certainly not a violation of the treaty of 1818.

Why is it, let me ask, that a ship that goes in there with all the tackle necessary for fishing for mackerel, but being a purely commercial ship, not having a crew shipped for the purpose of fishing, not having any fishermen aboard, can go into one of the ports of the British possessions, buy what it chooses to buy, and go out again without obstruction; and yet if a fisherman goes in there, a man whose business it is to fish, he is condemned if he undertakes to buy anything but wood and water or claims anything but shelter. The argument is not reasonable; it is not a proper construction of the British law; and when we have said that we have said all that can be said about it. If there was no law but the treaty of 1818, then our fishermen could not go there, except for shelter, for wood, and for water, but the British Government has enlarged that by granting to us the commercial privilege in a sense of reciprocity for certain like privileges that we have granted to them. That is the state of the law of this case.

If that is so, it seems to me there is no difficulty at all either in construing or in handling this matter. As I remarked before, I can not see that there is any difficulty in the construction of the treaty of 1818 taken by itself. All the rights that are guaranteed there and that have not been enlarged by statute of Great Britain obtain, and there is no difficulty in the construction of them. There is no difficulty in the construction of the British statutes on this subject. But, then, we are not called upon to construe them. What we are called upon to do is to protect our people against any wrong construction that they may put upon their own laws, by a power that we reserve expressly in the hands of the President of the United States. That is, when the President of the United States is satisfied that the British people have legislated in hostility to our commerce or that they have construed their own laws in hostility to our commerce, we have the right to suspend intercourse with them either absolutely or partially. That power is given to the Executive, and he does it by a proclamation. That is an indispensable power, for the reason that there is no diplomatist, no set of diplomatists who have ever lived who can arrange between themselves all the rights of the people of two different states or nations in respect of a subject that is so intricate, so involved, that has so many incidents about it as this subject of conducting the fisheries. It must necessarily and naturally be left to the legislative power of the respective countries, left to the United States to say what privileges they will admit the British people to in our own waters, and left to the British people to say what privileges they will admit us to in their waters; and then if they discriminate against us, or if by the construction of their own laws they inflict what we conceive to be injustice to us, whether they think it is right or wrong, we reserve the power in the hands of our Chief Executive by proclamation to stop the intercouse till they come to their senses or until we come to some agreement. That is the situation. There is no other, there can not be any other.

I do not wish to volunteer any opinions about this subject before a question gets before the Senate and I am compelled to act upon it; but my convictions are very strong; they are fixed; indeed I may say that we can get along with the people of Great Britain on this subject without any further treaty at all and without any further legislation. If any one were to ask me what provision of a treaty I would frame to compose and settle any question of fundamental law between us and Great Britain in respect of the fisheries, I could not suggest it, or if I were asked to propose an amendment to the statutes of the United States so as to put the control of this intricate subject more completely in the hands of our own Government I could not frame the amendment to the statutes. I would not know how to do it. I believe that both the treaty stipulations and the situation under the statutes are about as complete as we are able to make them. There may be other interests, and there are other interests lying between the people of the British possessions and the United States that I would like very much indeed to see promoted by further negotiation, but I can not call to mind, there is no suggestion to my mind of, any improvement that we could make under existing conditions of our rights in the fisheries of that Northeastern coast.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Do the British Government and our Government differ as to the rights of fishermen under the law?

Mr. MORGAN. I really believe they do not. I have seen no evidence of it.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the trouble then?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think there is any.

Mr. GEORGE. Do the colonial legislatures and authorities deny the right of our people under the municipal laws of England?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine has suggested that they have been denying us some rights, that some governor up there has issued a proclamation in which he has made a statement of the law, but I believe he has taken that back and referred the subject to the mother government. There was a denial of the right to one ship to ship a crew, and of another ship to buy bait, but they have not resulted, so far as I understand, in anything.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator that we have a right under the treaty to buy ice and bait in the provincial ports. Is that right denied? How is that?

Mr. MORGAN. I understood the Senator from Maine to say a moment ago that they had conceded that.

Mr. FRYE. They have yielded all but the ice and bait, which are the most important for us.

Mr. MORGAN. Everything but that?

Mr. GEORGE. Then what question is at issue between the two governments? The right claimed is asserted, as I understand, purely under the municipal law of Great Britain, not under the treaty. Is that so?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly not under the treaty, but under the municipal law of Great Britain, under the law giving us the right to trade there.

Mr. GEORGE. What prevents Great Britain from putting her own construction on her own statutes?

Mr. MORGAN. Nothing in the world. She can put it on any moment she pleases, and all we have to do then is to put our construction on our statutes and retaliate. That is all we can do. You may frame the laws and amend them as much as you please, you will come back to that every time.

Mr. FRYE. Allow me. The Senator understands, does he not, that there is a law to-day, a law of 1823, under which the President is not only authorized but directed to make proclamation under certain circumstances?

Mr. MORGAN. I referred to that a moment ago.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator understands that to be the law now?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. How is that? I was diverted. Will the Senator from Maine repeat his statement?

Mr. FRYE. I read the statute the other day. I was not certain it had ever been repealed or modified. Does the Senator from Alabama understand that it remains precisely as enacted?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; no question of that. I called attention to it the other day when the Senator from Maine was debating about it. That is the solution of the whole matter, and that is the power we have over the subject, and it is the only power we can ever get over it. If we expect to improve our advantages or powers in respect to this commercial intercourse, we had better go to our own statute and amend it, if it needs amendment, but I do not know how to amend it.

Mr. GEORGE. Would it not be well to base the right to buy ice, bait, and all that sort of thing on the interpretation of the law?

Mr. MORGAN. Ice and bait are not mentioned in this treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. I know they are not.

Mr. MORGAN. Ice and bait are therefore to be treated as articles of commerce. If we have any right to get ice and bait there, it is under the commercial privilege extended to us by the statute of Great Britain.

Mr. GEORGE. Which Great Britain has a right to interpret for herself.

Mr. MORGAN. Interpret for herself until we come to our right to interpret, and then we say, "If you interpret it in that way we interpret our statute so and so."

Mr. GEORGE. That is retaliation.

Mr. MORGAN. And it is all you can make of it.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not come to any agreement.

Mr. MORGAN. It would hardly be expected, I think, that the diplomatic powers of two great governments should enter into a negotiation to determine the distinction between ice and bait on one side and bacon and flour on the other as articles of commerce; neither of them is mentioned in the treaty, but I should think it was unfortunate for the civilization of this age, especially I should think it unfortunate for the character of the publicists of this age, if they should find it necessary to interpret the meaning of ice and bait so as to exclude them from the commercial list, when everybody would admit that flour and bacon are included in the commercial list.

Whatever is legitimate traffic, whatever is not contraband, is lawful traffic in any port to which you have the lawful right of access; and if it is ice and bait it is just as much commerce as if it was flour and bacon. You can not claim ice and bait under the treaty, you can not claim flour and bacon under the treaty, but beyond question a merchant ship has the right to go there and buy flour and bacon and a fisherman has the right to go there and buy ice and bait if also his is a commercial ship, for a fisherman may have two characters, and every one of them I believe has two characters. One is a business or vocation of catching fish, and the other is of dealing in freights or in merchandise, traffic, barter, or exchange under license just as they wish. We do not send any ships out of our ports, as I understand, exclusively for the purpose of fishing, but we arm every one of them with a sea pass and give them the protection of an enrollment or a registry, so that they are American ships in every sense of the word and commercial ships in every sense of the word.

Now, Mr. President, I beg to call attention again to the treaty of 1818 and to insist that the proviso which is found in the latter part of Article I was never intended for the purpose of discriminating against American ships and denouncing American fishermen or putting them under any bad character, casting any imputation or reproach upon them, but it was intended to provide for them privileges that at that time did not exist in the hands of ordinary commercial vessels—a favored class of ships under the treaty, a class of ships favored because of the advantages which they brought to the people living upon that northern coast. The passage of laws afterward by Great Britain did not change that construction, did not put them under the ban; and there could be no stronger evidence of the intention of the British Government that they should have enlarged privileges of traffic more than could be imputed by those statutes in reference merely to ships of commerce. Ships of commerce came in possession of their rights in 1823, not before that. Fishermen came in possession of their rights in 1818 under the treaty. It was an easy matter therefore for us or for them to put our fishermen upon the commercial basis and to give them the advantage of the commercial regulations and laws of the country. That is where our fishermen get the right to buy bait and buy anything else that is not contraband.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Maine says that right is denied, as I understand him. The right to buy bait and the right to buy ice are denied by the colonial authorities.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that while it was denied by some of the British people there, the authorities of Great Britain are not denying it. At all events whenever it is authentically notified to the President of the United States that that right is denied, and he believes that is a right secured to us under the reciprocal advantages, as I will call them, of parallel legislation between the two countries, he has nothing to do but resort to that act of Congress and say "I proclaim as President of the United States a suspension of trade until this matter is rectified."

Mr. GEORGE. He has that power under the law now.

Mr. MORGAN. He has that power now. I was speaking of the legal situation. I was trying to state to the Senate that I did not know how to improve it either in putting the matter to new negotiation to define our treaties, or in putting it to new legislation to define or to protect our rights. It would take a great deal of negotiation to go over the whole field and to prescribe everything that a fisherman might do and that any other class of ships might do. Therefore I think that the Government should leave the matter just where it is, and I do not think Congress can be persuaded to repeal that act. I have not heard yet from any source whatever a suggestion with regard to its amendment.

Mr. President, so far as I know that covers the whole case. With this view in my mind, I did not believe that it was necessary that the Congress of the United States should create a grand joint commission to negotiate about the matter. If the President of the United States or the Secretary of State thought that by a negotiation with Great Britain they could remove out of controversy any of the questions which have been mooted between the people of the different countries, that is well enough; let them proceed and do it. So far as I am concerned I am entirely content with the state of the law as it is, both as expressed in the treaty and in the statute; but still, as has been suggested here, some contention might be modified, or, perhaps, might be relieved entirely by a negotiation between the two governments which should settle expressions in regard to some of these disputed matters. If that is so, let it go on; but I confess I can not see any reason for a great joint commission between the two countries for that purpose. The truth is that all the suggestion about a joint commission or a high commission had reference entirely to the re-establishment of some form of reciprocity between this country and Canada.

I am in favor of reciprocity. There the Senator from Maine and myself differ, I dare say. I am in favor of making reciprocal agreement with our neighboring nations—I would not go very far abroad to do it—for the purpose of easing up the irritation of commercial friction. I would be very glad, indeed, if it could be accomplished, to see every state in the Western Hemisphere, in North and South America, upon a footing of commercial intercourse almost as free as that between the States of this Union. I believe it would redound greatly to the advantage of all the people in this hemisphere, and I think the aggregated power that would be accumulated in this way would make this Western Hemisphere something that men would be incapable of conceiving the power, grandeur, and force of.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator, is there not some danger, with the different interpretation of the rights of our fleets, of a collision being brought about?

Mr. MORGAN. I think there is; but I do not think we can relieve it by negotiation. I think we can relieve it by enforcing the law on both sides. I think there is some danger, because there are enterprising citizens on both sides who would be willing to get up a fuss between the two countries.

Mr. GEORGE. May there not be something done to avoid it?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how you can do it unless by an arbitration law such as is proposed between the railroad companies and the strikers. If difficulty actually exists and is formulated by either government, then I should say that would lead to a negotiation of some kind for the purpose of relieving it. Irresponsible men, as far as diplomacy is concerned, who are getting up these troubles, can not very well be restrained by our action.

I will suppose a case. I am not aware that it exists, but I will suppose that some of the Gloucester fishermen desire to intensify American feeling a good deal just at this time for the purpose of holding on to the existing tariff on fish, and knowing that some thick-headed official in some Canadian port would deny to them the right to buy a barrel of flour or a barrel of sugar or to buy bait or something else under the treaty of 1818, if we should go back to that, and the moment they go there and make the request, this official comes out and says, "If you do not leave these coasts in your piratical enterprise of buying ice from our people we will have you arrested." Thereupon the Yankee gets his back up because he started out to get it up; there is a capture made; they libel his ship, put an officer on board, take him into a provincial court and condemn his ship. I do not believe the provincial court has any jurisdiction of it under the treaty at all. We can see that by a maneuver of this kind it is very easy to startle the American people, very easy to arouse them, and a speech against free fish made in the Senate of the United States with the background of a little flurry of that kind, by some smart fellow who went there for the purpose of getting up a row, would more than likely prevent any change of the duties on fish.

Mr. GRAY. That is just the case the Senator from Maine told us was probable about a week ago, that within a week's time there would be a ship seized there.

Mr. MORGAN. I was supposing the case as one probable because I had not heard anything like it having actually occurred.

Mr. FRYE. The tariff bill has not got over here yet.

Mr. GRAY. But the Senator from Maine said that was entirely probable within a week.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Mississippi asks me if there are not difficulties. I am expecting difficulties all the time, not between the governments, but I am expecting difficulties between private enterprising men who want to raise rows and whose business interests lie in the direction of getting up a fuss. I rather look for them, and I do not see any way in the world to prevent them unless we had some law on our statute-book which would punish a man for undertaking to bring his country into turmoil and discontent with other governments. But so far as I have heard yet in the matter of buying ice and buying bait and shipping crews, or buying anything else, our American fishermen have got a right to go there and get these things although they are fishermen, for that is conceded to them under British law.

Mr. President, I would not hesitate a moment in protecting a man in the assertion of his rights, even though he went upon an enterprise of the kind which I have intimated. We can not restrain all human nature; we can not curb and control the passions and selfishness of men in advance so as to prevent turbulence, prevent irruption, prevent strife between neighboring countries. What we have got to do is to observe a cool, quiet, honest, sincere policy toward the people of other countries, insisting upon all that is due to us and demanding nothing that is not due to us.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator what in his opinion is the duty of the Government of the United States in the supposititious case which he puts of a vessel having been seized for attempting to buy bait in a provincial port.

Mr. MORGAN. I think then it would be a good occasion for the Secretary of State to ascertain all the facts in the first place, and whether or not the Government of Great Britain espoused the cause of that official, and whether in making the espousal of his cause the Government of Great Britain violated its own plain laws or violated its laws as we understand them; and if the question grew into that magnitude that the Government of Great Britain had determined through the instrumentality of this man to inflict a wrong upon us as a people, I do not know where I would go. I know there is one direction I would not go; I would not back out of it. I would try to have it settled peaceably according to the American spirit.

Mr. GRAY. There all agree. The Senator takes the position that we do not want to back out of it; but carrying the supposed case a little further, the vessel having been condemned by a provincial court by proceedings in rem, and the judge of that court having interpreted the municipal law not to have enlarged the privileges given to American fishermen by reason of their having a commercial license, and that being the authoritative interpretation by the courts of the provinces and so far of the courts of Great Britain, that this treaty stipulation was not enlarged by the statute law, what proper remedy have we, except to say that we must fall back on the treaty of 1818? Inasmuch as the municipal laws of Great Britian have failed us, can we put an interpretation upon them and insist upon it?

Mr. MORGAN. Unquestionably we can do that. Our men in going there do not go under the license of the treaty of 1818; they go under the license of the British statute, and if the statute is in existence at the time they go there we should not hesitate to resent any wrong done to our people, any of them, for the performance of any innocent act, innocent at the time. What might be the result of it after we had had our controversy, I do not know. We might be forced back to the treaty of 1818, because they might repeal their laws and we repeal ours and thereby proclaim again non-intercourse between the British provinces and the United States. That might be the result of it. But all this is now answering a beneficial purpose. It shows the impolicy of discussing any question of this kind as a mere problem, not upon an existing state of facts, not upon an issue made up between us and Great Britain, but upon a supposititious state of facts, conjectural entirely, and so far as I can understand this whole business we are dealing from beginning to end with it as a conjectural matter, and not as something that actually exists, and not as something that actually claims the attention of the Government, at least this branch of it.

Now notice the embarrassment here in speaking about what we should do in a certain case. Here are Senators who have to vote upon all the treaty relations that become laws between this and other countries; here we are debating a question that is not up, upon a state of facts that is only imaginary, and we are quoting very gravely propositions of law and tracing out their analogies and their history, and we are saying also in this state of case, "I would do thus and so," and some other Senator says, "In this state of case I would do thus and so." All this debate has been brought before the Senate of the United States by what I conceive to be a mistaken call upon the Congress of the United States for its assistance in conducting this matter. The Congress of the United States has no assistance to grant in this case, and ought not to be called upon to grant it. If we were settling the issues of a war, as we were in 1871, and if we were settling questions of damages that were still open between ourselves and foreign countries growing out of alleged breaches of treaty obligations, then it might become necessary for Congress, in order, perhaps, to give emphasis, or some direction, or make some ancillary provision of law, to indulge in anticipation for the purpose of creating a great commission to go out and settle the question. Nevertheless when we came to settle that most important question that we have ever had since the war of 1812, the question of the Alabama claims, connected with which, by British ingenuity, was some almost indefinite claim in respect of the breach of the fisheries treaty, we did not come to the Congress of the United States and ask them to enact a law creating a great high commission. There were ten commissioners who negotiated the treaty of Washington, five on a side, but there was no statute and no joint resolution authorizing the making up of that great commission.

The President, under his constitutional power, created and organized that commission. The law stood here empowering him to do it. The constitutional power of the President was sufficient, but we have provisions of law by which the President may appoint embassadors and other public agents, and we limit the number, the only limit being that Congress shall grant the money for the purpose of executing the commission which he puts in their hands. In that great trial and struggle—for it was one of the most intense and dangerous character to the American people—Congress was not called upon to create a commission.

So in this case I really do not see that there is any occasion for a commission. I can not so consider it. This is not a subject out of the ordinary course of affairs. Admit that the American fishermen and the Canadian fishermen are in some sort of controversy about their respective rights—yet I do not believe they are at much controversy about them—is not that a matter which the ordinary agencies of the diplomatic organization of our Government can deal with, without bringing the subject into Congress and asking that it shall be debated; that opinions shall be stated, grounds taken, committals made, policies foreshadowed? Really I do not see the reason for it.

But the resolution presents not one of these questions. They come arguendo simply, and I think it takes a pretty lively imagination to get a proper foothold on which to discuss the questions we have engaged in discussing upon this resolution. The resolution is:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two governments on the coasts of the United States and British North America, ought not to be provided for by Congress.

If such a commission is to be provided for at all, let it be done under the constitutional powers of the President. He can appoint embassadors to go there, if he wishes, or the Secretary of State along with the British minister can negotiate the whole question here, or it can be referred to London and negotiated between our representative there and the head of the British foreign office. There is no lack of agencies, no lack of power, no lack of authority, and therefore there is no occasion for this discussion in the Senate about it. Still I hope that the discussion of it will lead the people of Great Britain to understand that whatever rights we have under the treaty of 1818 we consider are perfectly clear, and what rights we have under the British statute we consider entirely clear, and that if we should unfortunately differ in our opinion with them about what our commercial rights are, we have the power in our own hands to rectify it; and that is the whole case. Therefore I am in favor of this resolution, but I put it upon the ground that Congress ought not to provide by law for a commission. I do not want Congress to do it.

Now, make your question as broad and as important as you can state it, and let it relate to a subject of negotiation, of treaty relation between this Government and Great Britain in respect to the fisheries or to any other matter, not a question relating to the settlement of damages or the private rights of individuals who may be mutual claimants against the one government or the other, but, as in this case, a question entirely free from all such considerations and all such involvements, a pure question of diplomacy as to what shall be the future relations of this country with Great Britain in respect of our fisheries, whether they shall be changed or whether they shall not be changed, whether they shall be interpreted in one way or whether they shall be interpreted in a different way: under such circumstances I deny the right of Congress to raise a commission to settle a question of that kind, under the Constitution of the United States.

If Congress has the right to raise a commission, Congress has the right to instruct the commission. We have raised several commissions, or authorized their being raised by the President of the United States, for the purpose of settling mutual claims between citizens of different governments, and so far as I remember we have never hesitated at all to put certain limits upon the powers of the commission. "You shall meet at a certain time; you shall sit so long; you shall hear so much evidence. In the event of a difference between the two regular commissioners, you may select an umpire, or we will provide a means for getting an umpire. And the decision of these gentlemen or of the umpire siding with one or the other shall be final and conclusive." That is a commission in its proper sense; that is the business of a commission. That is not a business of negotiation, but it is a business of settling damages growing out of some previous negotiation; and so we give instructions and limitations and put boundaries upon the authority of commissions of this kind. But when, as in the case before the Senate at this moment of time, everything that is to be done relates to some disputed proposition of law, merely some disputed proposition as to what shall be the future policy of the two countries in regard to fisheries or reciprocity, then I submit that it is an improper exercise of power by Congress to raise a commission. If Congress can raise a commission, I insist that it can instruct it, and therefore it should not do it.

I believe in holding to the rights and powers of the Senate of the United States upon this question and upon a good many others that Senators seem to be willing to throw to the winds. The Constitution of the United States makes us the constitutional advisers of the President in respect to the matter of negotiating treaties with foreign powers. There is no occasion for going to Congress to ask its authority, because the Senate and President have the power to act. The President and the Senate in respect of the relations between themselves and foreign governments can make the supreme law of the land, whether the other House participates in it or not, and no President can veto it; he may refuse to negotiate, and that is the end of it. Therefore I would leave this subject entirely in the hands of the ordinary diplomatic functionaries of the Government, supplied as they are with every ample facility for conducting any negotiation that can possibly touch this subject. I suppose there is no misunderstanding about what we are doing here. The honorable Senator from Maine introduced his resolution. It had a "whereas" to it, and it went to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It read thus:

Whereas the President in his late message recommends "that the Congress provide for the appointment of a commission in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be respectively represented, charged with the consideration and settlement, upon a just, equitable, and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two Governments and their respective citizens on the coast of the United States and British North America;" and

Whereas "the fishing rights" were settled for ten years by a commission appointed under the treaty of Washington at a cost of $5,500,000, paid in money, and a remission of duties amounting in the ten years to about $6,000,000 more; and

Whereas the effect of the terms agreed upon by the said commission was further an increase in the Canadian fishing fleet of five hundred vessels, and of seamen ten thousand, with a corresponding decrease in our own fleet and sailors, without any appreciable benefits to the people of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That in the opinion of the Senate the appointment of a commission clothed with such powers ought not to be provided for by Congress.

The committee have reported back without any recital at all the simple resolution which presents merely and only the question whether this is a case in which Congress should be called upon to provide a commission; and although we are acting negatively upon it and against what appears to be the recommendation of the President of the United States, I do not hesitate to say, as a friend of the powers of this body, and conceding that I am one of the number in which every other Senator is only my equal charged with the duty of preserving the constitutional powers of this body, I am not willing upon an occasion like this to ask the intervention of the Congress of the United States to raise a great commission or any commission for the purpose of settling a question that seems, after all, to be scarcely a question at all.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, as it is the purpose, I believe, of the Senate to proceed to vote on this question, I will detain them from the vote for some very brief observations which I think it suitable that I should make.

I regret that important engagements before the Judiciary Committee have detained me there in important matters; and I had supposed that I should have an opportunity to-morrow to present perhaps more fully, and certainly more usefully if I could have heard the observations of the Senator from Alabama, the views I entertain. It is, however, I think, important that we should understand what our relations are toward Great Britain and the provinces on this subject of the fisheries, and on this other subject, the intercourse of commerce and trade.

So far as this resolution itself is concerned, I should not regard it as suitable to be originated in the Senate if no communication had been made to us from the President on this subject. But as that communication has been made, and we have seen the basis upon which that communication is rested and the interchange of notes between the State Department and the British minister that have led up to an agreement in regard to the management of the fisheries of the two countries ad interim, and including in that the purpose of engaging this Government in a new convention, a new arrangement, a new comprehensive settlement of the matters regarding intercourse with the provinces and the fishery enjoyments, I think it is important that this body should express its mind on this topic.

As I understand it, Mr. President, the relations of this Government toward Great Britain and toward the provinces on the subject of the fisheries and on the subject of intercourse of trade, are two independent subjects; that of the fisheries rests entirely upon treaties; that of intercourse of trade or commerce rests either upon the general conventions of commerce, or upon legislation that has proceeded in the enactments of the Parliament of England and of the Congress of the United States in the same intent and with the same results toward free, convenient, and amicable intercourse in trade.

As it has seemed to me, there had been some inattention or some want of circumspection on the part of the State Department in not observing this discrimination. All the treaties that we have had on the subject of the fisheries are embraced in the first treaty of peace and partition of empire, so to characterize it, between Great Britain and ourselves after the Revolution. As we all know, the fishing grounds and fishing coasts up to our Revolution had been enjoyed by all the people of the Colonies as a part of the British Empire; and when after the successful prosecution of our Revolution, and its success recognized by Great Britain, we had before us nothing but the drawing of lines between the possessions of the new-made nation and the mother country after this severance was completed, the lines of territory were drawn, and then there came to be a partition of this fishery, which had been one possession before, but now was to become one of a joint interest. And there the lines were drawn firmly, that we were to have the rights of fishery there as we had theretofore enjoyed them.

Now, besides the fishery itself, that is the occupation and pursuit as upon the water alone, there came to be in connection with the useful prosecution of the fishery a certain right of resort to the land. The whole region was desolate and unoccupied, and the then method of fishing made it quite necessary that there should be a constant, or certainly a frequent, resort from the vessels occupied to the land in the curing of their fish, and the curing then was in the simple method of the uses of drying, as it was called, and such sustenance for the crews and protection against the severity of weather as was required. So the provision in regard to access to the coast or use of the coast was but a part of the execution of the fishery right and its enjoyment, and in itself formed no part of the access given to us, for the purpose of trade. The word "trade," or "purchase," or the idea of intercourse by trade, did not enter into that treaty, and no more is it in the later treaties. The use of fire-wood was the use of the forest, and the use of the coast was for the exposure of the fish to drying by the sun.

Afterward, from the war of 1812 having interrupted our relations with Great Britain, the pretension was set up by Great Britain that this division as to the fishery was not a division of empire between us and Great Britain in that regard as a permanent establishment of our independence, and its lines drawn, fixed, permanent, and subject to no possible disturbance, but that this part of the division of empire was treated as a concession or privilege resting upon convention that was separable and made no longer permanent and secure.

We were not in a condition to cope with this great adversary upon as high terms as we now should be able to do. My own opinion has been, so far as I understand it the prevalent opinion of the public men of this country has always been, that it was a very severe and a very unjust treatment of us in regard to the fishery that when peace was restored our rights were not the same in that regard as they had been before the interruption of peace. But we did enter into the treaty of 1818. That follows very much in the line of the original treaty except in the limitations, but the traits of that relation were preserved the same, that it was not a question of trade nor a question of hospitality, but as a part of the fishing rights and interests, and with the same rights of resort to the coast as had prevailed in the earlier arrangement of the first treaty of 1783.

In each of these treaties it was provided that whenever this use of the shores in connection with our fishery brought us in contact with settlers, in occupation in severalty or otherwise of the coast, we, under this general right of our fishery purposes, by our own authority and permission, should not interfere with the local occupation and local interests, except by agreement with them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That included the fishery within the three-mile waters as well.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes; I am drawing no line between the three-mile limit and the other waters. All this had nothing to do with trade and with purchase, and the question of bait not being mentioned, nor ice, nor any of these circumstances of intercourse by trade acquiring for money and contract, these topics do not appear at all.

When therefore we were approaching a larger and larger occupation and interest of population there, still it was the same question. You do not find in the treaty of 1818 the least regulation of the question of our right to buy bait, or our right to buy ice, or any circumstances of trade. Our right in regard to bait there under the treaty was the right to catch bait as covered by the fishing right we had; and whenever we had only the fishing right then bait already caught and separated from the sea was like any other item of exchange and commerce that the occupants of those distant shores might have occasion to find to their advantage in dealing with us.

But we have changed our system of fishing, and by reason of that change this whole matter of our catching the bait-fish has disappeared from any uses to our enjoyment. Our method of fishing now is so changed that we no longer practice our allurements or deceits upon the individual fish we are pursuing; our distribution of bait is to spread it upon the waters as if the gift of good Providence for the fish, and to entice and hold them there, and while they are enjoying this their greedy pursuit, whithout any hook appearing, our new method of larger strategy upon the fish is to surround them with our seines and then, as if they were outcasts upon an inhospitable shore, place them on the decks of our schooners. That method we can not carry on by catching the fish, which was the simple one of catching a herring and putting it on a hook and then catching a codfish. Of course it became very valuable to these provincials if they could sell us bait at prices satisfactory to themselves and we could pursue our deep-sea fishing in the manner I have suggested. As the Senator from Maine has stated, I believe we paid $125,000 a year in the purchase of bait.

There was trouble under the 3-mile exclusion accomplished by our treaty of 1818. Of course, a line upon the surface of the water not nearer than 3 miles may readily be honestly obscure to the opposing interests, and it may be made the occasion of annoyance much beyond any such honest difference of opinion. To a certain extent, it was desirable for us that this line of disturbance between the two countries should be removed; and when we came to the convention of 1854 by which the reciprocity arrangement was completed, we then introduced this matter of the inshore fishing. There were many other exchanges of interest in that reciprocity treaty, but the right for us to fish without any limit was met by an equivalent right on their part to fish in our waters without any such limit.

Our experience under the twelve years that the reciprocity treaty was in force gave us very definite and very trustworthy evidence of what was useful and valuable in regard to this inshore fishing. It ought to have advised, it gave in my judgment advice to the provincials, what the value of that inshore right to us without any limit of line was, and of how much to them was the value of intercourse by trade.

Our Government, with entire unanimity, as I am advised, on the part of the two Houses of Congress, gave notice of the termination of the reciprocity treaty as soon as we had an opportunity to do so, and that indicated not only the judgment of the interests of our fishermen and of all interested in that pursuit of how much or little importance there was in it, but it was evidence of the attitude of our Government that we were not asking for or desiring any renewal of that privilege. We had had the privilege.

No notice came from Great Britain to dissolve that right, she having an equal power to terminate it on her part; but we, with entire unanimity, had put an end to this enjoyment in the fishery. True, there were other considerations of interchange of commodities between the provinces and ourselves; but from the experience of that twelve years' enjoyment under the reciprocity treaty, and the alacrity and the unanimity with which we dissolved that enjoyment of fishing as soon as we had an opportunity, no public man could have imagined that it was our interest or our disposition to take an attitude of inviting or desiring for our own interests to have a renewal of that authority.

After an interval of several years, in which to be sure there was no very great disturbance, we came to the great treaty of 1871, the treaty of Washington, a treaty, as we all know, for its large and principal subject furnishing the motives and the inducements, and which furnished the great frame of the treaty, had regard to the Alabama claims. Another great interest was to be settled and was settled under that treaty, and that was our northwestern boundary at Vancouver's Island and Puget Sound.

When we approached the subject of the fisheries what had we of instruction as to the estimate which the British Government and the provincial interests placed upon the treaty so far as they were interested in having it negotiated? Manifestly always, and so distinctly avowed, what Great Britain desired, what Great Britain for the provinces demanded as the principal if not the absolute and only proposition upon which they would enter into this arrangement, was the gain of our market for their fishery products in the consumption of our people. Our people were not at all disposed to opening this market. At no stage were we in that attitude, and certainly our fishermen never had a desire that their markets should be parted with in any reference to their expectation of benefit to them thereby. Lord Elgin stated this very distinctly when the negotiations for the reciprocity treaty of 1854 were approaching. I read now from page 302 of the Foreign Relations of the United States for the year 1878, in which these words of Lord Elgin, as governor-general of Canada, to Sir Henry Bulwer, British minister here, written in 1851, are cited:

> Her Majesty's Government are prepared, on certain conditions and with certain reservations, to make the concession to which so much importance seems to have been attached by Mr. Clayton, namely, to throw open to the fishermen of the United States the fisheries in the waters of the British North American colonies, with permission to those fishermen to land on the coast of those colonies for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the owners of private property or with the operations of British fishermen.
> Her Majesty's Government would require, as the indispensable condition in return for this concession, that all fish, either fresh or cured, imported into the United States from the British North American possessions, in vessels of any nation or description, should be admitted into the United States duty free and upon terms in all respects of equality with fish imported by citizens of the United States.

Thus as early as 1851, prior to the convention of 1854, we had announced to us that the sine qua non, the absolute need of interest to be consulted on the part of the provinces was this free market for their fish here. No negotiations could be entertained in regard to the fisheries that we were to gain of getting within the 3 miles, whatever importance we might attach to it, that could not be considered unless they had this market, without which as it was very apparent their fishery interests would languish and shrivel and shrink away. With that experience, then, this original view was confirmed by their enjoyment of our market during the twelve years of the reciprocity treaty. Now, how did Great Britain approach us in reference to this market when the treaty of 1871 was on the carpet and was to be disposed of? That our market was indispensable to them, that that equivalent was for them all that was important and desirable, or at least without it nothing was valuable enough.

We had this experience about the fishery during the twelve years of the reciprocity treaty, that our fishing within the 3 miles was of no great importance to us. These new methods of fishing had developed themselves, and we did not regard it as valuable to us. We did, however, repeat in the treaty of 1871 substantially the equivalent article in regard to the inshore fishery for us on their coast, and gave them the inshore fishery upon our coast, and then we gave the free market for their fish.

Seeing the attitude in which the negotiators of this treaty on our part had a right to look at this question of the value of our acquired fishing inshore as compared with what we had conceded to them in our free market, we had a right to consider that under the statement of Lord Elgin before the reciprocity treaty was negotiated and the experience on both sides of its twelve years, we having our fishing inshore on their coasts and they having our market, the inshore fishing was trivial and the market was inestimable.

Then came about a negotiation as to what should happen in regard to what might be called an owelty of partition. The provinces, it was said, would not be satisfied until and unless there had been some ascertainment by some impartial tribunal of what the comparative value of these exchanged equivalents on the one side and the other was. We offered to say, "We pay you more in this market than all that you give to us, but we are willing in order for convenience and good neighborhood to obliterate that line, and we will pay you a million dollars in perpetuity for that line over and above what we have given in the free market for the twelve years, or the ten years." They must have a valuation, and our negotiators seem to have been the victims of too great confidence in two great nations looking at the same subject in the same way before the negotiations that it would be maintained after they came to the arbitration and ascertainment of these values.

Out of this grew the fishery commission at Halifax and the fishery award there; and as the commissioners kept no protocols in which they took and expressed the evidence concerning the value of the fishery on the one side or the other, after the astounding award of $5,500,000 was announced, we had no mode of exhibiting to Great Britain our conviction that the very matter which had been submitted under the arbitration to the commission had been transcended, that the submission had been transcended by the award and therefore we were not bound by it. But this Government had made up its mind on this subject; and notwithstanding the gravity of the situation by which questions should be raised in regard to settlements that had been accomplished under arbitration, the appropriation of the $5,500,000 was granted and placed at the power of the President to make that payment only upon condition that after a correspondence between our Government and that of Great Britain the President should still find it his duty to make the payment. Under that necessity and duty a correspondence was opened by the State Department with the foreign secretary of Great Britain, and the following is a portion of the dispatch which I addressed to Mr. Welsh on the 27th of September 1878, to be communicated to Lord Salisbury:

Eortunately, there are trustworthy criteria for determining the value of the concession of Article XVIII, as I have defined that concession to be. They are resorted to, upon one side and the other, and confessedly furnish the material upon which the appraisement, if confined to the subject as truly defined, must turn. If, then, upon the evidence, if found conflicting or divergent, the largest measure of valuation deducible therefrom be given in favor of the concession of Article XVIII, and that extreme value shall show no rational or approximate relation to the sum awarded, there would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that the concurring commissioners accepted some other subject for their appraisement than that submitted to them.

It happened that before the Halifax commission had concluded its labors five fishing seasons of the treaty period had already elapsed, and the actual experience of the enjoyment by the United States fishermen of the privilege conceded replaced any conjectural estimate of its value by reliable statistics of its peculiar results. These statistics disclosed that the whole mackerel catch of the United States for these five seasons in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, both within and without the 3-mile line, was 167,945 barrels. The provincial estimates claimed that three-quarters of this catch was within the 3-mile line, and so to be credited to the privilege conceded by Article XVIII. The United States estimate placed the proportion at less than a quarter. Upon the provincial claim of three-quarters, the product to our fishermen of these five years of inshore fishing would be 125,961 barrels. It was established, upon provincial testimony, that the price which mackerel bore in the provinces, cured and packed ready for exportation, was $3.75 per barrel, and this would give as the value, cured and packed, of the United States inshore catch for five years, the sum of $472,353. But in this value are included the barrel, the salt, the expense of catching, curing, and packing, which must all be deducted before the profit, which measures the value of the fishery privilege, is reached. Upon the evidence, a dollar a barrel would be an excessive estimate of net profit, and this would give a profit to our fishermen, from the enjoyment for these five seasons of the fishery privilege conceded under Article XVIII, of but $25,000 a year, or for the whole treaty period of twelve years of $300,000.

Although there would seem to be no reason for distrusting this commercial and pecuniary measure of the privilege in question, yet if it should be pretended that the provincial value should not be taken, but the value in the market of the United States; and, further, that an extravagant rate of $10 per barrel should be assumed as that value, and, again, beyond all bounds of even capricious estimate, a conjectural profit of 50 per cent. should be assigned to the fishing adventures, we should have but $125,000 a year, or $1,500,000 for the entire twelve years of the treaty, for the gross valuation of the concession to the United States by Article XVIII, undiminished, by a penny, for the counter-concessions of the United States of Articles XIX and XXI. Yet this sum, thus reached, is but little more than one-quarter of the award of the concurring commissioners, after taking into account the deductions required for the privileges of Articles XIX and XXI.

The proofs disclose another wholly independent criterion of the value of the privilege conceded to our fishermen by Article XVIII of the treaty, drawn from the experience of some years intervening between the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty and the negotiation of the treaty of Washington. The provincial government in these years adopted a license system by which vessels of the United States were admitted to the inshore fishery upon the payment of fees for the season, rated by the ton. The experience of this system showed that under an exaction of 50 cents per ton our fishing fleet generally took out licenses; that when the fee was raised to $1 per ton, the number of licenses fell off about one-half; and when a fee of $4 per ton was exacted, but few licenses were taken out. The fairness of this measure of the value of the privilege is obvious. It furnishes a compensatory rate between opposing interests, suggested and acted upon by them without coercion, and by concurring consent.

The tonnage, taking out licenses under the first and lowest rate, was about 32,000 tons. Assuming contrary to experience, that this tonnage would have borne the highest rate of $2 per ton, the sum of $64,000 per annum would have measured the value of the privilege in question, and would have yielded for the treaty period of twelve years $768,000. By this method the valuation of the privilege of Article XVIII (without deducting a penny for the counter-privileges of Articles XIX and XXI) would be but about 14 per cent. of the award of the concurring commissioners, after they had taken into account these privileges.

You will say, then, to Lord Salisbury, that with every anxiety to find some rational explanation of the enormous disparity between the pecuniary computations of the evidence and the pecuniary measure announced by the concurring commissioners, this Government has been unable to do so upon any other hypothesis than that the very matter defined in Article XVIII, and to which the proofs on both sides were applied, and the very matter measured by the award of the concurring commissioners, were not identical nor even similar, and that such award, upon this reason, transcends the submission.

The demonstration at which I have aimed appears so conclusive upon the mere consideration of the concession of Article XVIII as to supersede, so far as the immediate argument goes, an exhibition of the reduction even of the moderate sum above assigned as the true appraisal of the concession of that article by the pecuniary value, as laid before the commission, of the counter-concessions of Articles XIX and XXI. But a brief statement of the views of this Government on the treatment of these counter-concessions in the deliberations of the Halifax commission is requisite both to the completeness and frankness of this exposition.

In brief, it may be said that Her Majesty's Government formally insisted in their "case" and in their "reply," laid before the commission, that the concession of Article XIX, whereby British subjects are admitted to the freedom of our coast fisheries north of the thirty-ninth parallel, is, to quote the language of the "case," "absolutely valueless;" and that the concession of Article XXI, admitting fish and fish-oil, the product of the provincial fisheries, to our markets duty free, to quote the language of the "reply," "has not resulted in pecuniary profit to the British fishermen, but, on the contrary, to the American dealer or consumer."

If I have been at all successful in showing the enormous disproportion between the sum of $5,500,000 announced as their award by the concurring commissioners and the pecuniary value which the evidence assigns to the concessions of Article VIII, by itself considered, I need spend little time in showing that these commissioners must have accepted the views of Her Majesty's Government that nothing was to be allowed for countervailing value to the concessions of Articles XIX and XXI, or that these commissioners had in their minds a measure for the concession of Article XVIII still more inconsistent with the true treaty definition of the subject described in that article and submitted to the appraisement of the commission.

If the concession of Article XIX was held by these commissioners to be "absolutely valueless," as asserted in the "case" of Her Majesty's Government, it must have been because the pecuniary profit to the provincial fishermen of the privilege, as actually enjoyed by them, was the true measure of estimation of the value of the concession. In this view, the immense value of these fisheries, as shown in the evidence, all went for nothing, because the population, capital, or enterprise in the provinces could not carry on what to them were remote fisheries in competition with our own coast population. Without insisting upon the unreasonableness of measuring the value of our fishing grounds by the incapacity of provincial resources to engage in the fishery opened to them, this disposition of the value of the concession of Article XIX recognizes the whole force and result of the reasoning by which I have assigned the true criteria of value for the privilege of Article XVIII, under the experience of the actual five years' enjoyment thereof by our fishermen, who were able take advantage of the privilege, and did so to the furthest extent compatible with profit. The vice of the reasoning by which a right of fishing, valuable in its own capacity, is measured by the tenant's incapacity to fish is obvious. It furnishes no true criterion of the rent value of a fishery, which is what was needed to be got at both under Article XVIII and Article XIX. Under Article XVIII we furnished a true criterion by the experience of a tenant, confessedly willing and able to improve the fishery to the utmost, and actually doing so.

I now desire you to present to Lord Salisbury's attention the subject of the concession of a free market in the United States for the products of the provincial fisheries as made by Article XXI. The value of this privilege to the provinces was required by the treaty to be measured by the Halifax commission and deducted from their appraisement of the concession of Article XVIII in favor of the United States.

The statistics of the importation under this privilege showed that, at the rate of duty prevalent before that concession, a revenue of about $200,000 per annum on mackerel alone, and of more than $300,000 on all kinds of fish (mackerel included) and fish oil, would have accrued to the United States. For the purpose of argument, conceding that but one-half of this annual sum of $300,000 should be set down as pecuniary profit to the provincial interests, the sum of $1,800,000 would need to be deducted on the score of Article XXI from the true valuation of the privilege conceded by Article XVIII. If I have assigned correctly the highest possible measure of the privilege of Article XVIII, upon the evidence, as being not more than $1,500,000, this low valuation of the privilege of Article XXI more than extinguishes it.

Whatever disposition the concurring commissioners made of this countervailing concession of Article XXI—whether they gave it a value commensurate with the statistical evidence of the revenue loss to the United States and market gain to the provincial interest, or considered it absolutely valueless—the matter is one of much moment.

If these concurring commissioners gave the sum of $5,500,000 as the appraisement of the concession of Article XVIII, after deducting some two million dollars for the countervailing concession of Article XXI, the argument, as it seems to this Government, adequate before, becomes still more conclusive that the measurement, thus enhanced to some $7,500,000, was not applied and confined to the very subject submitted to the appraisement of the commission by Article XVIII.

But, it may be said, these concurring commissioners may have treated the concession of Article XXI as absolutely valueless to the provincial interests, and it was competent to them to do so. But this alternative is little consistent with the whole tenor of the views of Her Majesty's Government as maintained by successive cabinets and insisted upon in responsible negotiations, by their most eminent representatives, through a long course of years. Certainly, ever since 1851, when Lord Elgin, as governor-general of Canada, communicated through the British minister at Washington, Sir Henry Bulwer, to Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, the opinion of the British Government that the admission of the product of the provincial fishheriesduty free to our market was the one indispensable condition to our participation in the inshore fisheries of the provinces, down to the negotiation of the treaty of Washington, the attitude of the British Government on this point has been explicit and unequivocal.

Lord Elgin declared:

"Her Majesty's Government are prepared, on certain conditions and with certain reservations, to make the concession to which so much importance seems to have been attached by Mr. Clayton, namely: to throw open to the fishermen of the United States the fisheries in the waters of the British North American colonies, with permission to those fishermen to land on the coast of those colonies for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish: provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the owners of private property, or with the operations of British fishermen.

"Her Majesty's Government would require, as the indispensable condition in return for this concession, that all fish, either fresh or cured, imported into the United States from the British North American possessions, in vessels of any nation or description, should be admitted into the United States duty free, and upon terms in all respects of equality with fish imported by citizens of the United States."

The deliberations of the joint high commission, as presented in the protocols of their conferences on the fisheries, exhibit with perfect distinctness the British opinion as to a free market for the product of the provincial fisheries being a value to provincial interests which could not be missed, or replaced by a pecuniary substitute, in any settlement of the question. Thus, our high commissioners stated "that if the value of the inshore fisheries could be ascertained, the United States might prefer to purchase for a sum of money the right to enjoy, in perpetuity, the use of those inshore fisheries in common with British fishermen, and mentioned $1,000,000 as the sum they were prepared to offer." The British high commissioners replied "that this offer was, they thought, wholly inadequate, and that no arrangement would be acceptable of which the admission into the United States, free of duty, of fish the produce of the British fisheries, did not form a part."

After a consideration of commercial equivalents, in which the offers of our high commissioners were not accepted by the British high commissioners, all such propositions, on our part, were withdrawn, and our commissioners renewed their proposal to pay a money equivalent for the use of the inshore fisheries, and further proposed that, in case the two governments should not be able to agree upon the sum to be paid as an equivalent, the matter should be referred to an impartial commission for determination." To this the British high commissioners replied "that it would not be possible for them to come to any arrangement except one for a term of years, and involving the concession of free fish and fish oil by our commissioners; but that if free fish and fish oil were conceded, they would inquire of their government whether they were prepared to assent to a reference to arbitration as to money payment." Our high commissioners replied "that they were of opinion that free fish and fish oil would be more than an equivalent for those fisheries, but that they were also willing to agree to a reference to determine that question and the amount of any money payment that might be found necessary to complete an equivalent." Hereupon, as stated in the protocol, "the British commissioners having referred the last proposal to their government and received instructions to accept it," the fishery articles of the treaty were agreed to.

These opinions of Her Majesty's Government were entirely in accord with the views of the leading provincial statesmen. Mr. Stewart Campbell, of Nova Scotia, declared that, "under the reciprocity treaty, the total exemption from duty of all fish exported from the maritime provinces to the markets of the United States was also a boon of inestimable value to the very large class of British subjects directly and indirectly connected with our fisheries and its resulting trade." Sir John MacDonald said, in the Parliament of the Dominion, "the only market for the Canadian No. 1 mackerel in the world is the United States. That is our only market, and we are practically excluded from it by the present duty. The consequence of that duty is that our fishermen are at the mercy of the American fishermen. They are made the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for the Americans. They are obliged to sell their fish at the American's own price. The American fishermen purchase their fish at a nominal value, and control the American market. The great profits of the trade are handed over to the American fishermen or the American merchants engaged in the trade, and they profit to the loss of our own industry and our own people."

It may be that Her Majesty's Government has surrendered these opinions, and that the statesmen of the Dominion and the people of the provinces now think that the possession of our market for the products of the provincial fisheries is of no pecuniary advantage to these provincial interests. In such case, in any future negotiations respecting the fisheries, this Government would expect no stress to be laid upon this question of the possession of our own markets.

If Her Majesty's Government accepts the award of these concurring commissioners as carrying the necessary consequence that the concession of Article XXI is of no value to British or provincial interests, that element of calculation will disappear from any possible exchange of equivalents that the exigencies of any future friendly negotiations may need to find at their service. A privilege that is valueless when granted to and enjoyed by a beneficiary may well be reserved and withheld without the charge of its being even ungracious to do so.

If, on the other hand, Her Majesty's Government adheres to the views of the value of our market for the product of the provincial fisheries so often and so earnestly pressed upon the attention of this Government, and asserts that the award of the concurring commissioners must be held, upon necessary reasoning, to have measured and deducted this great value of free market from the appraisement of the concession of free fishing to us, made by them under Article XVIII, this Government will expect the more ready acceptance by Her Majesty's Government of the proposition, that these concurring commissioners, in their award, mistook the subject submitted by Article XVIII to their pecuniary measurement, and exceeded the authority under which the commission acted.

You will, however, very earnestly press upon Lord Salisbury's attention in advance of any declaration from Her Majesty's Government of their present views of the value of our markets for the products of the provincial fisheries, that this Government has not changed or at all modified its opinions on this subject. To dissemble or conceal from Her Majesty's Government this fact would be uncandid, and, by silence on our part now, breed mischief for future contentions or negotiations. This Government holds now, as it did by the mouth of its high commissioners in the conferences on the subject of the fisheries which produced the pertinent articles of the treaty, "that free fish and fish-oil would be more than an equivalent for those fisheries." The measure of pecuniary value which I have drawn from the revenue loss to the United States, calculated with extreme moderation, is an inadequate expression of the benefit to provincial interests and injury to our own from free importations.

It is still the opinion of this Government that the possession of our market is of vital importance to the maritime provinces, and such possession a formidable menace, if not a fatal wound, to our own fishing interests. I do not think that I misunderstand or misrepresent those interests when I say that standing, as we now do, midway in the treaty period, it would be better for those interests to surrender the enjoyment of the fishing privilege of Article XVIII for the remaining six years of the twelve, upon a resumption by this Government of the control of our own market for this unexpired period. If Her Majesty's Government and the provincial statesmen are firm in the opinion that the concession of Article XVIII parts with so much to us, and in the concession of Article XXI is valueless to British and provincial interests, it may well be worth while for the two governments to consider whether a mutual resumption of these exchanged interests may not be desirable.

I think it is demonstrable there, and no answer was ever made by the British Government to it, that the value of this fishery of ours upon the most liberal form of concession, the widest and most benevolent interpretation of the most favorable evidence that was offered on the part of the British Government before the commission at Halifax—the overwhelming superiority of the advantage to Great Britain from our market over any possible view of our inshore fishery advantage to ourselves, was an inevitable conclusion from a mere examination of the evidence.

We had two criteria. One was of the fishing product of the mackerel, for that was the only inshore fishery; our deep-sea fishery of the cod was outside the line. Our fishing interests there came to but a very trivial sum upon any estimate. The largest at which it could be put and on the most favorable view that I gave to it was $125,000 a year. Really that was an exorbitant and argumentative statement, which I made for the purpose of demonstrating that the award must have transcended anything that was submitted. But beside that, we had the criterion of what the value to the fishery interests or the government of the provinces was during the period in which we did not enjoy the inshore fisheries; that is, the interval between the expiration of the term of the reciprocity treaty and the commencement of our new fishing under the treaty of 1871.

The provinces established a license tax of 50 cents a ton on our vessels for the first year, a dollar for the second year, and $2 for the third year. For the first year, under the lower tax of 50 cents a ton, our fishermen for the most part, as I understand (and the Senator from Maine will correct me if I am wrong), took out the license of 50 cents. That itself measured what our people could get that privilege for and what it amounted to. I think something like sixty-odd thousand dollars was produced to the Treasury of the provinces. The second year, when they would tax us a dollar, but very few took out a license, and the revenue of the provinces was reduced, and when it came to $2 a ton not a single license was taken out.

Then we had an opportunity of measuring what was possibly an estimate of the value of the inshore fishing to us as understood and measured by them when we came to this market, which at the lowest statement is put at $300,000 a year duty that we lost. Treated in the rough manner that economists sometimes do, that when it is a duty laid one-half only is the profit of the importer that is saved, the difference between being free and being taxed; in other words, that if $300,000 was parted with, they lost but $150,000, and we gained, if you please, the other $150,000 in the cheapness of food for our people, that made $1,800,000 for the twelve years.

There was a distinct proposition to that commission to ascertain first what under the eighteenth article was the value of their inshore fishery to us; then what under the nineteenth article was the value of their inshore fishery upon our coasts; and then the value under the article providing for free fishing. It was a simple matter of computation to find out in dollars and cents what was the value under the eighteenth article, what was the value of the counterpart under the nineteenth article, and what was the value under the free market. All that was neglected and omitted, and the whole matter was swamped in an award that $5,500,000 was the difference between what was accorded to us and that which we had accorded to them.

Now, I come to the attitude which we took as we were approaching and reached the term of the treaty of 1871, and the fixed term of ten years was to be exhausted and finally was exhausted. Just as soon as we had the power of giving notice that we would forego the advantage of the fishery and other articles under the treaty of 1871, I think by an act or resolution of the two Houses of Congress on the 3d of March, 1883, it was done with entire unanimity as I understand from the Senator, who was then in Congress.

That was the attitude which this Government took in its correspondence with the British Government which I have adverted to; it was the action of this Government with entire unanimity. Now, two things happen. First, this treaty privilege came to an end. It came to an end on the 1st of July last, and the British minister seems to have taken it into his head that this would be an unforeseen and abrupt termination which would come down as a surprise to the fishermen, and find them in uncompleted voyages and investments that were suddenly cut short. Therefore the suggestion was made with a benevolent aspect on the part of the British Government that they would continue this in order to save these abrupt injuries.

How was this an abrupt injury to our fisherman? With the universal approval, by their promotion as early as the 3d of March, 1883, as early as we had an opportunity, we had given notice that we would terminate this fishery treaty, and we knew by fixing it for the 1st of July, 1885, our people knew that it was to be terminated then. Further, when the time had arrived for the action of this Government, the President of the United States, President Arthur, issued a proclamation, I think dated on the 31st of January, 1885, giving distinct notice of the termination of this business of the fishery.

The fishermen being the only persons interested in the prosecution of the fishery, were they the only people who were to find out in the waters of the provinces in the middle of July and in the middle of their voyages that their fishing rights had abruptly been terminated? It would occur to me that the Government had been inattentive to that element, and that the British minister and the British Government if they had felt this uneasiness in regard to an abrupt disturbance of the enjoyment of our fishermen were not circumspect in their observation of the preliminary arrangements that we had made for its termination, and certainly had been unobservant of the character of our people.

Besides this ad interim arrangement, the letters show that the British Government desired this, and that our Government also looked at it as an arrangement that should fairly contemplate a renewal of the subject of a restoration in some form or degree of the fishing interest which had thus been terminated willingly, gladly, by all the people of the United States acting through the two Houses of Congress. All through the letters it will be found that if our Government would appoint a commission which should undertake to settle these topics of the fisheries and such others connected in the way of intercourse between the conterminous portions of our country and of the provinces of Great Britain, it would be an element by which this concession would be made to us by Great Britain, that the rights of fisheries should not be enforced against us. It was part of the understanding, and so expressed by the President of the United States to Congress as soon as might be after the meeting of Congress. Accordingly the President addresses us in that sense, that this Government wishes to commit itself by its own wish and purpose to have a renewal of, I do not say upon the terms and in the form and manner of previous arrangements, but in some substance, efficacy, value and service to us, of a restoration of the previous existence of things.

It is in that view, and in that view alone it seems to me, that the attitude of this Government as disclosed in this correspondence with Great Britain, the attitude which it took in abrogation of the reciprocity treaty and enjoyments and of our termination of the treaty of 1871 as applicable to the fisheries and to free market, should be understood, and our Government should not be put in any doubtful attitude. On this subject the people of this country and the Houses of Congress representing them have come to a conclusive determination; therefore the Senate, at the earliest opportunity, should express its opinion against the desirableness, the fitness, or the propriety of pursuing the subject of a commission or other restoration of these matters in negotiation between the two nations.

If there are any interests that touch the provinces or touch the interests of Great Britain toward a new consideration of our free market, and an appreciation of it instead of a denunciation of it as being worthless, as was the whole argument of the British counsel before the Halifax commission, it is for Great Britain and the provinces to understand that we meant, when we said that we desired to terminate the two successive arrangements we have had of reciprocity and of fishery arrangement under the treaty of Washington, to terminate them as soon as an opportunity was given, and that it was inconsistent with the public conduct and attitude of this Government to suddenly assume the position of asking, of inviting, or even encouraging, a renewal of those subjects.

I will add now, however late the hour, a few observations in regard to what I consider the situation in regard to trade. This matter of ice and this matter of bait and all other subjects of outfit, including those of crews for fishing, rest entirely upon the basis of commercial intercourse and only commercial intercourse. As early as 1793, we having an establishment by which fishery vessels took out papers of a certain description of enrollment, and that gave them only the fishing rights, this authentic documentation of a fishing vessel as such gave it nothing but the fishery rights and gave it no mercantile or trading rights whatever. But as early as the year 1793, found in 1 Statutes, page 305, there is a provision that—

> When any ship or vessel, licensed for carrying on the fishery, shall be intended to touch and trade at any foreign place or port—

Application shall be made and permission given by the collector, and regulations as to manifests, &c., shall apply; in other words, a permit to trade which put the vessel carrying that permit on a ground other than that of a mere fishing vessel, section 34 establishing as an item of permit fees, 25 cents for every such permit.

Now, how did we stand as regards trading with these neighboring provinces? The colonial system of Great Britain was maintained by her, established in the time of Charles the Second, which precluded other nations from intercourse with her colonies except through the mother country. When we became free and independent we were put upon the same footing with all other foreign nations, and we had no commercial intercourse. Gradually through years following, in 1818 when we made the treaty, there came to be a relaxation of the system of Great Britain, and statutes were passed by our Congress recognizing these changes in 1820, in 1822, in 1823, and later still, till in 1830, by a proclamation made by General Jackson, it was understood that there was a great and general relaxation. But in 1849 a statute was passed by Great Britain which gave to the queen the right to close ports with such nations and trading parties as closed their intercourse and commerce upon this or that ground, with a right to revoke it at her will when the change of circumstances required it. In 1850, in view of that statute of Great Britain and bearing upon the subject, we passed a law, found in volume 9, page 469 of the Statutes, with this arrangement:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, provided the latter shall be satisfied that similar privileges are extended in the colonies hereinafter mentioned, is hereby authorized to permit vessels laden with the products of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward Island, to lade or unlade at any port or place within any collection district of the United States which he may designate.

This statute, you will notice, does not pursue the phrases of similar regulations by statute which generally assign to the President the duty of a proclamation as the statute of 1830 required, and which was followed and pursued by President Jackson. Thinking that this proclamation must be necessary to bring about this concordance between British legislation and our legislation of opening the trade of our ports to the provincials and the provincial ports to ourselves, it must necessarily have been evidenced by a proclamation; and one would look on it that there must have been some obscurity or concealment or accident about it; but, on looking at the statute, I think we shall see that nothing but a Treasury recognition of it was necessary, because the statute itself pursues those terms; that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, if the President is satisfied, shall open our ports.

It seems to me that in all this subject of buying and selling bait and ice and other commodities we do not need to look for support for enjoyment to any of these treaties about fishing, but in common with the whole substance and mass of intercourse of trade between friendly nations like Great Britain and ourselves, and including now the freedom of intercourse with the provinces which was so long denied by Great Britain in the earlier days as the basis, I shall anticipate no firm or protracted insistance on the part of any of the authorities in the provinces against our enjoyment of what is the common possession now of friendly nations in the intercourse in all commodities that are useful to them.

My attention has been called to the term of the warning as put out from the minister of marine and fisheries in the provinces; and it will be observed in this language that it is not restricted at all to fishing vessels or to the fishing trade. Let me read this operative clause of the warning:

> Therefore be it known that, by virtue of the treaty provisions and act of Parliament above recited, all foreign vessels or boats are forbidden from fishing or taking fish by any means whatever within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors in Canada, or to enter such bays, harbors, and creeks except for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever.

That is to say, all foreign vessels are precluded from access to their ports for any purposes of trade and traffic. For that there is confessedly no support; and an attention to this discrimination between the rights that come by the power to fish and the rights that come by the power to trade will soon, as I hope, dispel all the disturbances of interest that now for the moment interrupt the true and harmonious intercourse which should characterize us between our great nation and the Canadian possessions.

Mr. TURNER. I understand that the order to which the gentleman from Texas refers is a continuing order.

The SPEAKER. It is a continuing order.

Mr. TURNER. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered on this election case at the end of eight hours' debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that; it is giving too much time to this case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asks unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered on this report. Is there a substitute to be offered?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; we desire that the minority shall have consent to offer their resolutions as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. A single resolution, or more than one?

Mr. TURNER. There are two resolutions, and I have no desire to cut off either.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered on this report and such substitutes as may be offered at the expiration of eight hours of actual debate. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object. Eight hours of continuous debate on this subject will take all the week.

Several MEMBERS. Only to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then fix the time.

Mr. TURNER. If I may be allowed to make a statement, I desire to say, for the benefit of gentlemen, that I had hoped to impose shorter limits for this debate, but I could not procure the consent of my associates on the committee, who had views of their own they wished to present, and for which they required at least this time I have mentioned. If consent will not be given, I give notice that at the proper time I shall ask the House to impose the limit of eight hours which I have indicated.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, is it in order at this time to move as a substitute for the resolutions of the majority the resolutions reported by the minority of the Committee on Elections?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor, but he can yield it if he desires for that purpose to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I understand he consents to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will then send up his minority resolutions.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On behalf of the minority I submit the following substitute for the pending resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions reported by a part of the minority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Jacob Romeis was not elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Frank H. Hurd was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his objection to the request made by the gentleman from Georgia. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TURNER. I yield the floor now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE].

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the tenth district of the State of Ohio is composed of the counties of Lucas, Erie, Ottawa, and Sandusky. At the election in October, 1884, the opposing candidates for Congress were the sitting member, Mr. Romeis, and the contestant, Mr. Hurd, Mr. Romeis the Republican, and Mr. Hurd the Democratic candidate.

It appears by the return that Mr. Romeis was elected by a majority of 239. At the same election candidates for other offices were voted for, among them candidates for secretary of state. In this district, composed of these four counties, the majority for the Democratic candidate for the latter office was 2,706. The majority against Mr. Hurd was 239, a difference of 2,945. This result was brought about by Mr. Hurd's vote falling behind that of the Democratic candidate for secretary of state something over 1,500. And the voters who thus dropped him were not content with doing that, but seem to have voted for his competitor.

There come from the Committee on Elections three reports. The report of the committee, concurred in by nine members, finds that Mr. Romeis was elected. A minority report, made by four members, finds that Mr. Hurd was elected; still another minority report, made by two members, finds that neither of the candidates was elected. As a result of these reports we have——

Mr. ROBERTSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that nine members of the committee concurred in this majority report?

Mr. BOYLE. I so understand it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I did not so understand it.

Mr. BOYLE. I base the statement on the fact that there are fifteen members on the Committee on Elections. Four sign one minority report, two another, and that will leave nine as concurring in the report of the majority.

I can be mistaken as to only one member, and as to him I think I am correct. So at least ten members of the committee, and I think eleven, find Mr. Hurd was not elected. There are but four who find he was elected.

The contestant seeks to set aside this return, and in order to do so he asks this House to throw out entirely the votes of three election precincts—Precinct B of the eighth ward of the city of Toledo, Precinct C of the third ward of the city of Toledo, and Kelley's Island, in the county of Erie.

In addition to this request, which does not impress me as a very modest one, he asks that corrections be made in several precincts of the city of Toledo, on the allegation that illegal votes were polled therein. In this he is supported by the minority of the committee, and in this way he figures out his own election by a majority of something over 200 votes. To throw out the three precincts to which reference is made would be to disfranchise between 1,100 and 1,200 voters in that Congressional district. After a pretty thorough and careful examination of all the facts in this case, I am convinced that there is not only no sufficient ground for reversing this return and unseating Mr. Romies, but, sir, there is, in my judgment, no good reason why the seat should have been contested. I believe the House will so conclude when it learns the facts.

I proceed at once to take up in turn the four matters in controversy; that is to say, the three precincts to which I have referred and this matter of certain alleged illegal votes in the city of Toledo. First, as to Precinct B of the eighth ward of the city of Toledo. In that precinct, sir, as returned, the vote of Mr. Hurd was 105 and that of Mr. Romeis 325, giving to Mr. Romeis a majority of 220. Mr. Hurd asks that this precinct be rejected on two grounds: First, he alleges general bribery—bribery to such an extent as to invalidate and make void the entire vote of the precinct. He asks further that this return be thrown out on the ground of irregularities—I believe he alleges nothing more—upon the part of the election officers, irregularities of such a character as from his standpoint would make the returns uncertain and therefore unreliable.

As to charge of bribery, let me say that it is a very grave one. If general bribery has been proved, the vote of the precinct should not be counted. If particular instances of bribery have been proved, and the corrupt votes can not be separated from the honest ones, the precinct should be thrown out. Bribery is to be proven, not presumed. It must be proven like any other fact alleged against a return. It is not to be conjectured or guessed at. The presumption is that votes cast are honest votes, and that elections are honestly conducted; and he who alleges the contrary must make satisfactory proof, or his charges will go for nothing.

Let us see if this charge of bribery is supported by proof. There is, sir, not a solitary fact in existence showing that a dollar went into the precinct from any quarter. There is not a particle of evidence of the bribery of a single voter in that precinct.

I make these allegations with a full knowledge that the record is before the House and that I am to be followed by gentlemen who have made as careful an examination of this testimony as I have, and who understand the case as well as I do, and perhaps better.

The witness whose testimony is relied on is one Gerstmann. It is not pretended that he proves more than that arrangements were made for sending money to Toledo. It is denied that he proves even that much. He seems to have had a checkered career. It appears from his own testimony that he enlisted as a private soldier in 1854 and served five years. He was discharged in 1859, and in 1860 he turned up in Savannah, Ga. The war came on, and Gerstmann, having no taste for military life, became a peddler and a Jewish rabbi. To what church he was attached or where he ministered does not appear. He claims to have preached and peddled by turns. He remained in Savannah until 1870.

From that time forward it can not be made out from the testimony of Gerstmann where he has lived. He has been everywhere by turn and nowhere long. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the testimony they will find that he is a man of many homes, of many avocations, of many parties. Perhaps it would be nearer the truth to say that he is a man of no place of abode, of no avocation, and of no party. [Laughter.]

On cross-examination he declined to give an account of himself. He also declined to say whether criminal charges had or had not been made against him, whether he had been in prison, or whether rewards had been offered for his arrest.

In 1880 he turns up in California. There he supported General Hancock for the Presidency. Unfortunately Hancock was not elected. After the inauguration Gerstmann came to Washington to secure an office from President Garfield. He did not succeed. We know nothing more of him until August, 1884, and then he became a resident of Cincinnati. In one part of his testimony he says he went there from Savannah; but in another he says he left Savannah in 1870.

In September, 1884, he appeared as an agent of the Republican national committee, and claims to have been sent by that body through Ohio. He went to Toledo. He says himself the committee did not intrust him with any money; and he does not pretend his mission had any connection with money. He went to Toledo, and went among the Poles and the Germans. He says he was in Precinct B of the eighth ward of that city, although he did not know one precinct or one ward from another. He says he learned that everybody was for Mr. Hurd.

But from whom he learned this he does not say. He names only one man, a Mr. Warnke; and this man contradicts all Gerstmann swore to. He says he reported the condition of affairs to the Republican national committee. His first visit to Toledo was early in September. He did not return to New York until the latter part of September. Then he made his report. How long he remained there is not clear. In one place he says two days, in another until the middle of October.

He claims that while in Toledo he learned, from whom he does not say, that the sad state of affairs there could be changed only by beer, and that would require money. He appears to have confined himself to Precinct B of the eighth ward. Money for other parts of the city does not seem to have been thought of. His report was based on the condition of that precinct; and it is claimed that the money he was to have sent was to go to that precinct only.

Bear in mind that he made this report late in September. He returned to Toledo a week before the election. He found all changed—everybody for Romeis. A very few days had passed after the national committee was informed funds were necessary until Gerstmann returned to Toledo. The theory is funds were sent on his report. The funds must have been sent very promptly indeed, for when he got there he found a complete revolution had been accomplished by the use of this money. While in New York he called on the Democratic national committee and saw Mr. Smalley. From what followed he appears to have entered into the service of that committee also.

When he returned to Toledo he reached there at 11 o'clock in the morning. He went to a Democratic family, a Mr. Hynes. Immediately after he went—where? To the Republican committee? Oh, no! He then called on Mr. Jackson, the secretary of the Democratic committee, with whom he had a long conversation; going to another member of that committee and offering assistance to the Democrats. He must have put in the afternoon in that way; and the same evening he shook the dust of Toledo from his feet, to return no more.

It does not appear that he saw a single Republican; and yet it was during this visit he claims to have learned of the revolution among the voters, and to have learned from the countenances of the people that they had been bought to vote for Romeis.

I have spoken of Gerstmann's visit to the national Democratic committee. I am convinced that his second visit to Toledo was in pursuance of an arrangement made with that committee. I think so for various reasons. One of them is the fact that at his second visit he consorted with Democrats only. Another is that he received a letter from Mr. Smalley, secretary of the national Democratic committee, addressed to the chairman of the Ohio Democratic committee. He also received a dispatch from Mr. Jahn, who was connected with the national committee. He first swore that he burned this letter the same night he received it. Seeing that this falsehood was detected, he confessed to having the letter subsequently, and to using it and the dispatch. I make this statement of Gerstmann's dealings with the Democratic committee with a good deal of reluctance. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOFF. He was employed by the Democratic committee then?

Mr. BOYLE. I fear he was serving a new master. Gerstmann says he had no authority to promise money, that he promised none, that he was intrusted with none. He is careful to say on two or three occasions that he had no money, and had nothing to do with money, further than to report to Mr. Elkins; and I have shown Elkins could not have sent the money after Gerstmann's report in time to produce the marked change which Gerstmann saw in Toledo a few days later.

Now, Mr. Speaker, will you believe that that is the evidence upon which this charge of bribery is founded? That is the evidence of the sending of money into Precinct B of the eighth ward of the city of Toledo. It does not appear—it may be true, but I take it that we are proceeding upon evidence in determining the right to this seat—it does not appear that one single solitary dollar was sent into that precinct. I have stated the preparation for the bribery. I have stated the whole of it. What is the evidence of the actual bribery? I will read that, as it is brief. There is a witness in the case named Louis Jahn, and this is his testimony in proof of the payment of money, and it is all there is in the case:

Q. What, if anything, do you know about any money being paid to voters there that day after the election was over?
A. Much as I know was about nineteen ticket peddlers around there, and Henry Gates paid them off the same night in Joe Boldt's grocery.
Q. To what political party does Henry Gates belong?
A. To the Republican party; he was the vice-president of Precinct B.
Q. What, if anything, do you know of the amounts of money paid to these nineteen persons by Henry Gates?
A. As much as I know, some of them got three dollars, some five, and a few got ten.
Q. How long have you resided in that precinct?
A. Over eight years.
Q. As a judge of the election, which political party did you represent?
A. The Republican.

That is the whole evidence as to bribery. He stated on cross-examination that Henry Gates told him that he paid nineteen ticket peddlers. It is all hearsay; but assuming it to be true, and that Henry Gates did pay the ticket peddlers, does that prove bribery? I venture to say that that is done in every city in the country of the size of Toledo. That is not bribery or fraud, but on the contrary, it is one of the most effective measures against fraud. There would be no such thing as holding a fair election in a city even as large as Toledo without the employment of ticket holders, and of course when men are employed for that service they must be paid. In Pennsylvania, where every precaution has been taken to prevent the use of money in elections, the expenditure of money for the distribution of tickets is expressly allowed.

I have stated the evidence as to the arrangement for sending money, and the evidence of the payment of money—everything paid or pretended to have been paid. There is not one single particle of evidence beyond this. And it is upon this that the contestant asks that 420 voters, who for aught we know were as fully qualified and as much entitled to their votes as any other 420 men in the country and not one of whom is shown to have received a cent, shall have their votes thrown out!

But the contestant attacks this precinct on another ground. He alleges that there were such mistakes made by the clerks and the judges in making up the return as to render it uncertain. Let us see. The evidence upon that point is briefly this: At the close of the poll the tickets were taken from the ballot-boxes and counted without tallying. They were put in two piles, one judge counted a part and another judge a part, and when they added their numbers together (without having kept any memorandum as they counted) they found that there were 438 or 436 tickets. There were only 430 names of voters on the poll-book, so that there seemed to be an excess of 6 or 8 tickets over the number of voters.

They counted again, as appears by the testimony of some of the witnesses, who are contradicted by others, and by that count they found that there were only three tickets in excess of the number of voters. Then they opened the tickets, separated them, and counted and tallied them, and upon that count they found four tickets less than the number of voters on the poll-book. So that the possible extent of the uncertainty ranges from 8 votes in excess of the number of voters on the poll-book to 4 votes less, or only 12 votes. This can be corrected, and the contestant allowed the full benefit of it, and the result will remain unchanged.

It will readily be seen how mistakes may have occurred in the first count, which was made without tallying. In fact, it would have been almost impossible for two persons to have made a count of that kind without making mistakes.

But when they came to the third count, which was the only one they should have made, they found that there were four tickets less than the number of voters on the roll. Was this correct? It may be doubted. There is a strong probability that they neglected to tally 5 votes. These people (who do not seem to have been men of much intelligence), in order to get rid of the difficulty, upon the suggestion of the contestant's principal witness, gave to each of the candidates 2 votes [laughter]—a very neat and easy solution of the difficulty, hardly allowable, but a mistake which can be corrected. That is the extent of the uncertainty. That is all that is pretended to have been done.

My own judgment is that it is more than was done. I do not believe there were any votes in excess of the names on the poll-book. The clerk who made the tally, and who seems to have been the most intelligent man on the board, says that from the beginning there were fewer tickets than there were voters upon the roll. But, assuming the testimony of Louis Jahn to be true, he makes no stronger case than what I have stated.

Louis Jahn, through his entire examination and cross-examination, maintained that at no time were there fewer tickets than there were names upon the poll-book; that at all times the tickets outnumbered the names on the poll-book. Yet after a certain adjournment he came in and made his testimony agree with that of another witness, the Democratic judge who had testified, that finally there were fewer tickets than names on the book.

Mr. GEDDES. I would like to inquire why the election officers counted the number of ballots in advance of beginning to tally. According to my understanding, the usual practice is for the officers to take the poll-book and tally as they count. I can not understand why they should pour the tickets out on the table and count them before commencing to tally.

Mr. BOYLE. Well, I would not undertake to account for what election officers do after the polls are closed. The law fixes a certain manner of proceeding; but election officers are what are called plain people. They are not in all instances acquainted with the law, and if they were the probability is that, without having any evil intention whatever, they would not follow it. To exact strict compliance with it would invalidate a great many honest elections.

This, I say, is the extent of this uncertainty. And the contestant says, because there were 6 or 8 votes more upon one count and 4 votes less on another than the names on the poll-book, the whole 430 votes should be thrown out.

The contestant's witness, this man Jahn, was on the board as the Republican judge; but from my reading of the testimony he voted the Democratic ticket. There was a Democratic judge on the board—a Mr. Kelley, who had served in the same capacity many years. Both he and Jahn and the clerk and everybody else who testified in regard to this count say it was perfectly honest. I do not understand the contestant to allege that it was fraudulent, but only that there were mistakes. But Jahn went upon that board as the representative of the Republican party; and when he was asked on cross-examination whether he had voted for Newman or Robinson (Newman being the Democratic candidate, and Robinson the Republican) the contestant's counsel interfered and advised him that he was not bound to answer. He proceeded a little further, when the question was repeated and persisted in; and then the contestant himself felt it his duty to warn this man who was there as a Republican that he should not tell for whom he voted for secretary of state or for Congressman.

Now, if he was an honest man and a Republican, as he pretended to be, there could have been no reason why he should not have been permitted to state the fact. It was to the contestant's interest to have it proved that he was a Republican, as he claimed to be. Jahn, is the same election officer who testified to the bribery of the ticket peddlers. I see that much is attempted to be made of the admissions extorted from Jahn on cross-examination, that he signed the return knowing it to be incorrect, and also from the statements of Jahn and other witnesses that they did not know what the true vote was. This is hardly a legitimate use of that testimony. All they intended to say was that they were uncertain, because of the difference in the several counts, and only to the extent of those differences. They could not tell the very vote, but it was not pretended that it differed much from what was actually returned. They all swore that everything was done fairly, that they knew of nothing fraudulent, and that the small mistakes made in counting produced all the uncertainty there was.

The contestant asks also that Precinct C of the third ward shall be thrown out. It was a Republican precinct. It is claimed on the part of the contestant that after the polls were closed and the officers were ready to make the count a man named Bell, who had been a Republican officer in this district time out of mind, and who had moved out of the precinct in the spring, after being again appointed, but was unable to keep away from his old stamping-ground, and remained there during election day and during the night while the votes were being counted, at one time put his hand into the ballot-box, took out a handful of tickets, and laid them on the table for the judges to count. It is not pretended that he put anything into the box; it is not pretended that he put anything on the table that he did not take out of the box, but the simple fact that he put his hand into the box and took out tickets and laid them on the table, the contestant says, is sufficient to justify throwing out this precinct of nearly 400 votes.

Now, the testimony in regard to this is given by the Democratic clerk, a Mr. Emerick. Judge Potter, the Democratic judge, who had served on that same board with Bell, as he states, for I think forty years, says that his impression is that it was at the October election he saw Bell touch the box and warned him not to meddle with it; and that that was the last of it. Another gentleman who was there swears that it was not at the October election, but at November. Bell himself testifies that it was at the November election when the occurence took place and when Judge Potter warned him against any interference. Nobody but Emerick pretends that the tickets were taken out by Bell, and not even Emerick pretends that any wrong was done.

Of course it was an unwarranted interference, and was improper. But when the officers came to count the votes there were so many names and so many tickets, without any possibility of substitution. Everything was done openly and publicly before every member of the board, one of the judges taking out the tickets, and another counting them, and the clerks tallying, without any attempt at concealment or secrecy. The contestant does not allege that a single ticket was substituted or that a single vote was taken from him; but because Bell took out the tickets he says the whole vote of the precinct should be thrown out. The election officers all swear that the proceedings were perfectly fair, that there was no fraud of any kind, and they vouch for Mr. Bell as an honest, fair man, who had served for years as a Republican election officer without suspicion of having ever behaved otherwise than with perfect fairness and honesty.

I pass now to the third precinct, Kelley's Island. That is an island in Lake Erie, where there were about 224 or 225 votes. The majority against Mr. Hurd on that island was 29. It seems there is a gentleman there engaged in quarrying stone named Norman Kelley, and it is alleged by the contestant that on the day of the election Norman Kelley, having remained away from the election all day, came in the evening and intimidated his men and prevented them from voting as they intended to vote—for Mr. Hurd.

Mr. Kelley is the employer of fifty or sixty men on that island, and the proof is that he did oppose Mr. Hurd to the extent of his ability; he did say to some of his men that the election of Mr. Hurd would be unfavorable to the business he was engaged in; that if Mr. Hurd should be elected, and if Cleveland should be elected, and free trade should prevail there would not be the demand for stone there had been under the Republican administration, and he would not need so many men, and the first to go would be the men who had voted for Mr. Hurd.

The only proof of direct interference is that he spoke to a man by the name of Peter Diffley. Diffley swears that Mr. Kelley did not speak to him at this election at all.

It is asked that these 50 votes, that is, all of Kelley's force, shall be thrown out, and the vote of that precinct shall not be counted, and in that way get rid of the 29 majority given to Mr. Romeis. There is no proof that these 50 men were voters. There is no proof that they were Democrats. There is no proof that any one of them was a Democrat. There is no proof that any one of them intended to vote for Mr. Hurd. There is no proof that they did not all vote for Mr. Hurd. It is clear some of them did vote for him. There is no proof a single man was influenced by Kelley's interference, whatever it may have been, to vote otherwise than he would have done without it.

Is this House, Mr. Speaker, is the Democratic portion of this House, prepared to throw out a precinct upon such grounds? My experience is that where employers undertake to control their men they usually produce the very opposite effect from that desired. Men under such circumstances assert their manhood and independence and vote their own sentiments regardless of the wishes of their employers. I know there are exceptions; but there is no evidence in this particular case that one single voter was influenced to vote against Mr. Hurd.

Look at the vote of that precinct at that election for secretary of state. The Democratic candidate received 106 votes; Mr. Hurd's vote was 97, only 6 less than the head of the Democratic ticket received. The vote for supreme judge was 102; Mr. Hurd's vote was 97, only 5 less; and the Democratic vote for auditor was 94, 3 votes less than Hurd received. I do not understand there was any bulldozing or intimidation to affect the vote for auditor.

The majority against Mr. Hurd was 29; the majority against the Democratic candidate for sheriff was 25. So Mr. Hurd did not lose 50 votes through the misconduct of Norman Kelley. He did not lose the 29 votes he asks to be taken from Mr. Romeis. He did not lose any, as appears from the fact that he received about as many as did the other candidates on the Democratic ticket.

At the election in November for President the majority against President Cleveland was 44—15 more than the majority against Mr. Hurd. So there is not only the absence of proof that there was any intimidation, or that any man's vote was affected, but there is absolute proof to the contrary; that the people there voted as they saw proper without interference, and just as they did elsewhere in the district. Mr. Hurd did not lose as large a proportion of the votes on Kelley's Island as he did in nearly every precinct in Toledo. He fell behind the head of the Democratic ticket in every precinct in Toledo, I believe, but one. In one case he was 65 votes short of the head of the Democratic ticket, in another 55, and the difference in majorities was double these figures.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I pass to the last claim set up by the contestant. It is that there were a number of illegal votes for Mr. Romeis in the city of Toledo, outside the precincts already named. I gather from the notice of contest that at the outset that was the principal ground on which the contest was based.

Running through the list of the voters at the October election and comparing it with the voters at the November election the contestant thought he discovered some seven hundred names of men who had voted at the October election and who did not vote at the November election. An investigation was instituted.

Mr. Hurd himself admits that nearly all of these voters were accounted for. Persons were sent out, and the alleged disappearing voters were nearly all found. He still claims, however, that some 200 and odd votes of that kind should be deducted proportionately from him and the sitting member in the wards in which they were cast and counted, and in that way, by some means, he succeeds in gaining an advantage over the sitting member of 79 votes. I confess I am not very clear as to the process by which he comes out ahead 79 votes; but that is the claim set up.

Now, the sitting member alleges, and has produced the proof, that for all of these 700 or 800 disappearing voters, except seventy-two or three, he has accounted; and I believe that to be true, that he has accounted for them to that extent. What more could be done, I ask? Here is a city of over 50,000 population at the last census, which has doubtless largely increased since; here is a city in which there are a large number of people coming and going constantly, not permanent residents, with a large foreign population. Many votes were accounted for by an improper spelling of the names on the poll-books—names of Poles and Hungarians, which nobody can spell.

This testimony, taken several months after the election, shows that these voters were all accounted for, even to the satisfaction of Mr. Hurd, except 200, and according to the claim of Mr. Romeis, 72. What more could be done in any city of this country of such a population four or five months after the election? Is there a city anywhere in the country where you can account for all of the votes, except 72 or 3, five or six months after the election? And it should be remembered also that according to the laws of Ohio a married man may live in one precinct to-day and to-morrow move into another one and vote there. No time of residence is required to authorize the head of a family to become a voter in any precinct. An unmarried man has the right to vote after twenty days' residence in a precinct.

It is not strange that these voters were not all found in the precincts where they had cast their votes at the preceding election; but as I have said they were all or nearly all accounted for, although in the nature of things there would be many removals between the time of the voting and the date of the investigation.

But I am compelled to confess, Mr. Speaker, and the figures make the confession unavoidable, that if there were any voters who voted at the October election and disappeared before the November election they must have been Democrats. It is utterly impossible to avoid the conclusion, because in every single precinct in the city but three the Republican vote was increased. The Democrats gained in only three and then gained only 5 votes in November over the October election, while the Republicans gained in all the other precincts, and their gain was 193 votes. Now if the claim of the contestant be true, there should have been a less Republican vote in November than in October; because he alleges that there were Republicans who voted in October who were not there to vote in November; and yet, when you take these precincts, every one of them but three, you find that there was an actual Republican increase at the November election over the October vote.

There is no proof that a single one of these alleged disappearing voters was a Democrat; there was no proof that a single one of them was a Republican; there is no proof that if they were there and went away they were not qualified voters.

The contestant alleges, and the minority of the committee present the same view, that attention having been called to these names of men who voted in October and had disappeared in November, and the burden is thrown upon the contestee to account for them, and not only that, but also to show that they were legal voters. Why, sir, in that way he might impose upon the sitting member the duty of proving that every man who voted was a legal voter by merely alleging the contrary.

Other allegations were made, but all have been abandoned. It stands first on the claim that these three precincts shall be thrown out, and that this correction shall be made in the vote in the city of Toledo to the extent of 79 voters; and in that way the contestant figures up a majority of over 200. If you throw out Precinct B of the eighth ward, and I can conceive of no reason for doing so, there is still left to the sitting member a majority of 19. And certainly this House will not throw out Precinct C of the third ward because Mr. Bell put his hand on the ballot-box, even if he did so. Nor will the House throw out Kelly's Island, where the contestant ran as well as anybody else on the Democratic ticket. And it will not do to take from the sitting member the number of votes in the several precincts of Toledo, which the contestant claims should be taken from him, on such proof as has been made.

It would have been more satisfactory to me as a Democrat to have found in favor of the contestant than against him. In a doubtful case I do not hesitate to say I would have found for him. I would have been for my party, although I do not mean to say that I regard contested elections as party questions. Party politics shall not control my conduct in determining contested elections. But if there had been any substantial reason for finding for the contestant I would have found for him with all my heart. No man who has ever claimed a seat in this body would have received my support more heartily, more cheerfully, more readily than the contestant in this case, because I have for him the highest admiration.

I know it has been alleged somewhere that the action of certain members of the committee was controlled by their views on certain questions on which the Democratic party is not entirely a unit, and in which they are supposed to differ from Mr. Hurd. Why, sir, if I thought that that had had the least weight with me in ascertaining who is entitled to a seat on this floor, a matter not only of the highest privilege but of the highest right, I would despise myself forever. And I can not believe that the party to which I belong, which in times past has denounced the conduct of the Republicans in the decision of contested elections, will in this instance seat the contestant simply because he is a Democrat and in disregard of the facts. If it does, I presume we will hear nothing more of the throwing out of precincts and counties and the change of results in the State of South Carolina, in Louisiana, and in others of the Southern States where wrong was done by the Republican party when it had the power.

In this matter, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the example of the Republican party. I intend to do here, and am doing, just what the Democratic party said it would do when it attacked the conduct of the Republicans with respect to the election cases to which I have referred.

How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. BOYLE. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am gratified, indeed, that this somewhat noted case has at last come before the House for decision. And I am gratified, too, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] who has just addressed the House was so considerate as to say if there was any particle of doubt about the case he would have resolved the doubt in favor of the contestant, Mr. Hurd. That was a high compliment to seven, at least, of his colleagues on the Committee on Elections, who find, four of them absolutely, that Mr. Hurd is entitled to his seat, two of them that Mr. Romeis was not elected, and one is neutral and stands so to-day.

So, then, in view of all this clap-trap talk that has gone all over this House in regard to the Elections Committee, I desire to state exactly how the case stands, in order that Members may vote intelligently upon it. I want them to know exactly the status of this case before the committee.

Now, I boldly and unhesitatingly say that there was not a substantial provision of the statute law of Ohio complied with in Precinct B of the eighth ward in the city of Toledo. They come and say Mr. Hurd has only a technical case. But I challenge any man on this floor to say that one single provision of that law was complied with.

In the first place, the statutes of Ohio require that the clerks shall be of different parties. I want the Democrats of the House to listen to this; I do not care anything about the Republicans, because we know how they are going to vote six months before an election case comes up. [Laughter.] I want gentlemen to understand that the laws of Ohio require that there shall be two clerks to the election board, and that they shall be of different political parties, but in this case they were both Republicans. Two of the judges of the precinct were Republican, and the third judge, who was a Democrat, was a non-resident of the precinct in which the election was held. That is the beginning of the fraud; that is the beginning of the iniquity; that is the beginning of the conspiracy that was formed and brought about by a combination between the national Republican committee, the State committee, and the local committee.

All these witnesses agree that there was some sort of an understanding between these bodies that Mr. Hurd should be beaten. In order to accomplish that purpose they started out with the view of fixing up members of the board to conduct that election who would be hostile to him, and they succeeded. They made out that Mr. Romeis had a majority, but how did they do it? Did they comply with the law when they counted the votes? No. What did they do? They did not do as the law prescribes, take out one ballot at a time and hold it up to be counted, but they dumped out the whole pile upon the table in the presence of twenty or thirty persons, and then what? Why, they counted them and they found there were 7 more ballots—mark it, gentlemen—7 more ballots than there were names of voters upon the poll-book. Then they put them back in the ballot-box and counted them again and made a final count, and there were 5 ballots less than there were voters' names upon the poll-book. That is, in the first count there were 7 more ballots than there were voters' names on the list and in the final count there were 5 less. The witness Louis Jahn testifies as follows upon this point:

Q. What was first done with reference to the ballot?
A. We opened the ballot-box and took the tickets out and put them on the table, all of them. The other two judges counted them. They counted them over twice, and always had more tickets than the names on the poll-book; one said 6 or 7; * * * never could get it out with the poll-book; the tickets never did agree with the tally sheet.
Q. What then was done with the tickets?
A. We put them all back—what was left.

That is, after they had opened them there in the presence of twenty or thirty fellows, finding on the first count a discrepancy of 7 between the number of ballots and the number of voters on the poll-book and on the final count finding 5 less ballots than there were names on the books, they put back "what was left!"

What else did they do? After they had fixed the matter and looked over the whole field they said, "Let us be fair. We have got Hurd beaten; we know it; we have a majority against him in a precinct which he carried at the last election; we have got him beaten, and now we will be fair." So, in a precinct where one man had 220 votes and the other only 105, they gave 2 additional votes to the one and 2 to the other. That was an awful piece of fairness! That shows how they conducted the elections there. No single provision of the law was complied with. I know gentlemen speak lightly about this, and say it was only an irregularity. From what these fellows do in the State of Ohio God Almighty only knows how they control elections elsewhere. Why, my friend from Mississippi [addressing Mr. SINGLETON], it beats your shotgun policy out of sight; it beats your tissue-ballots of South Carolina, and the bulldozers of Louisiana would pale into utter insignificance before these Ohio men. [Laughter.] My friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] had experience of that in his contest there at the last election. We have heard how the Republican Commissioner of Pensions was out there in my friend's district, and he was also in Mr. Hurd's district manipulating election matters. Now as to this being a fair poll, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] to the testimony, and all I have to say is if this was a fair poll in Ohio it would not be fair anywhere else. One of the clerks gave this testimony:

Q. You do not know then of your own knowledge how many ballots there were?
A. No more than what I stated before. I had to take the judges' word for that.
Q. Were they counted properly?
A. No, sir; none of us, judges or clerks, could tell the true number of votes.

James Kelley, one of the judges of election, was asked this question:

State whether or not the return, as made up by the officers of election, stated truly the result of the election in that precinct.

His answer was:

Well, that I could not say; the way it was mixed up, we could not say which way it was.
Q. State from what you know whether or not there was any certainty in the vote as ascertained and counted that day?
A. No; I could not give no certainty to it.

Now I turn to the evidence of Louis Jahn, one of the judges, on page 28 of the record.

Q. State whether the return, as signed by the judges, contains a true statement of the votes cast at that election?
A. To tell the truth, I do not think none of us could tell what was the true vote cast.
Q. State whether the return, as made, states the result at that precinct?
A. It is not the true poll.

Ah, here is a clincher for you. Here is one of your own judges; here is the man on whom the whole election depends; at least he was one of the men who conducted it; and I want this House to know what he says in regard to this matter.

Q. You say that the certificate is false, do you?
A. Yes.

Mr. BOYLE. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is the testimony of Louis Jahn.

Mr. BOYLE. That is the Republican judge who voted the Democratic ticket.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Well, then, that is the only good thing he ever did in his life. [Laughter.]

Q. You say that the certificate is false, do you not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You knew that the certificate was false to the poll-book when you signed it, did you not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Then you signed it, knowing it was false?
A. Yes, sir.

Do you tell me, gentlemen, that this ballot-box is not successfully assailed? Do you tell me that there was no fraud in that election? Do you tell me that that was a fair count and a free ballot? Now, what does the law say in regard to that?

Mr. HEMPHILL. What precinct is that?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Precinct B of the eighth ward in Toledo. That is the one we are seeking to throw out. Now, the law, according to Mr. Lamar, in one of his reports on an election case, which was sustained by this House, is this:

To validate an election there must be votes legally deposited by legal officers, and legally counted, and the result legally declared.

Now, gentlemen, can any man rise up and say that this was a legal election, a fair election, an election held in accordance with law?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Did the result of that election turn on that poll?

Mr. ROBERTSON. It turned on this and one other, which I can satisfy anybody is worse than this one.

Now, let me show the facts in regard to the combination that I spoke of. There was a conspiracy formed by the Radicals in order to effect the defeat of Mr. Hurd. The word went out from the national committee that he must be defeated because he was a free-trader. That is all there was in it. It was simply a base combination between the secretary, Mr. Elkins, and this man Gerstmann—"We will form a combination, and I will send you (Gerstmann) down to the city of Toledo." He did go there and he did ascertain what was the sentiment of the people down there. They told him they were all Democrats and in favor of Mr. Hurd. Being able to speak the Polish and German languages, the precinct being largely inhabited by that class of people, he went among them and found out that they were in favor of Mr. Hurd. Then he ascertained further how much it would take to secure the election of Mr. Romeis over Mr. Hurd. They told him "from two to three thousand dollars." He went back and reported the result. He stated that he was the agent of Mr. Elkins and of the Republican committee. Then, he says, he went back there afterward and found the sentiment all changed. Why? Simply because the money that was demanded in order to compass the defeat of Mr. Hurd had been sent.

Now, gentlemen talk about this man Gertsmann. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYLE] refers to him, I believe, as a "wandering Jew." Well, sir, the fact that he is a descendant of Moses does not make me love him any better or any worse. A man has a right to his own opinions, religious or political, "without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude." [Laughter.] I can prove by an honorable gentleman on this floor that this Gerstmann is a man of reputable character, a man who stands above reproach in the town where he lived for four years, and where he was the rabbi of one of the leading churches. [To Mr. BOYLE.] You did not know I could prove this.

Mr. BOYLE. I know you did not do it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I turn to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] and I ask him now to testify in regard to the standing of Mr. Gerstmann. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says I did not prove his standing. I want to know what the gentleman from Missouri says about it. I yield for his answer.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, the city of Saint Joseph has a population of about 60,000, and I venture the observation that no city of its size in the United States has a greater number of eminent, wealthy, respectable, and influential Jewish citizens than Saint Joseph. They lead largely in the social and business pursuits of that city. They are nearly all of them persons of the very highest character and of very large influence. For several years—I will not say how many, but certainly as many as four—Rev. Mr. Gerstmann was the Jewish rabbi ministering to the people to whom I have alluded. He ministered ably and successfully, and, so far as I know, to the entire satisfaction of the citizens of Saint Joseph, especially of those who worshiped in his synagogue. I can only say in addition that Gerstmann, as I understand——

Mr. WADE. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. BURNES. In one minute I will answer. Mr. Gerstmann, as I understand, was educated for the law, and after his ministrations at Saint Joseph he was led back into the practice of the law, and, resuming the practice after a fashion, he left Saint Joseph and came East.

I met him at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress in the United States Senate as the private secretary of a distinguished Senator in that body. With the exception of that meeting I have not seen him for several years.

I can say during his residence in Saint Joseph I do not think any gentleman ever questioned his character for truth or honesty.

I will now answer my colleague from Missouri [Mr. WADE].

Mr. WADE. The information which I sought from my colleague I obtained from a gentleman near me, and therefore will not trouble the House further.

Mr. BOYLE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BOYLE. Does this Mr. Gerstmann still live in Saint Joseph?

Mr. BURNES. I think not.

Mr. BOYLE. When did he leave there?

Mr. BURNES. Four or five years ago.

Mr. BOYLE. This Mr. Gerstmann involved in this case came to Cincinnati in 1884. He does not claim to be a lawyer. He entered the regular Army under twenty years of age. In all his statements of where he has been, and he has been everywhere, he does not say he ever was in Saint Joseph.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That shows he was trying to cover up his good parts. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYLE. Does the gentleman from Missouri know this to be the same Gerstmann?

Mr. BURNES. I will state that I received a letter from him this morning, written from Saint Louis, in which he informed me he was a witness in this case.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Well, that is enough on that point of this case. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his long and labored argument has attempted to show this man Gerstmann was not worthy of credence or belief. He attempted to show that if he was worthy of belief, coupled with the circumstances attending the great uncertainty of the vote of this precinct, then, as a matter of course, the return must be thrown out. Therefore I will concede, to myself at least, that much has been accomplished, and that 220 votes must be deducted from the return of 239 majority given to Mr. Romeis, which will leave only 19 votes for the sitting member yet to be overcome. That I will proceed now to do to the entire satisfaction of any gentleman who will listen to me.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, there is a precinct known as Kelley's Island. This Kelley's Island is an island in Lake Erie, on which there is but one precinct. About one thousand people live upon that island. Practically it is owned and controlled by one man, Mr. Norman Kelley. Most of the men who vote on that island are in the employ of this man, Norman Kelley, who is engaged in quarrying stone. He gives employment to about seventy of these men, and they embrace nearly the whole of the voting population.

This man, Norman Kelley, up to that particular time, Mr. Speaker, had never taken any special part in elections. On this occasion he went around among his men and told them if Frank Hurd were elected member of Congress and Mr. Cleveland were elected President free trade would then be established in the country and his business consequently would be ruined. In that event, he told them further, the first thing he proposed to do would be to discharge the men who had voted for Mr. Hurd and Mr. Cleveland.

These men were mostly Irishmen. Naturalized Irishmen usually are Democrats. If true to their convictions of what is right and what is wrong they are always Democrats. In my judgment there never was an honest Irish Catholic who does not vote when free and untrammeled to do so for the Democratic ticket. These Irish Catholics on Kelley's Island were intimate friends of Mr. Hurd. They believed in him, and trusted in him. They were the warmest adherents he had in making the contest for a seat in this Congress.

Well, late in the evening Mr. Norman Kelley goes down there to the polls and tells these men, "You have got to vote the Republican ticket or else you must go." That is a pretty hard statement to make to a poor laboring man who has a wife and children to support, who lives on Kelley's Island, and with the winter coming on. I am told this Kelley's Island is one of the coldest places on God's footstool, where the wind has the velocity of something like 100 miles an hour. [Laughter.]

This man Norman Kelley goes down and tells these poor fellows, who have been working in his employ at the stone quarry, and who were residents, with their wives and children, of this island, they must either vote the Republican ticket or else they must leave his employment and find work elsewhere! Now is this House going to set the seal of its approval upon such intimidation as that? Norman Kelley was not at the polls, but they sent for him, telling him something was wrong. He came up and wanted to take charge of the whole thing. He knocked one man down. I do not wonder when such things occur on the part of employers, when they undertake to dictate how the voters in their employ shall cast their ballots, we have the strikes of which we read in the morning papers. I am not astonished, therefore, that seven hundred thousand Knights of Labor knock at the doors of Congress and ask for some mode by which their grievances may be investigated, the cause of their trouble discovered, and the remedy of their grievances provided as far as possible.

No; for I say that when a man who with the whip and lash can disfranchise seventy-four of the laboring people of this country in his employ, who are Democrats by instinct and made to vote the Republican ticket, it is no wonder that such appeals come up to Congress. You can not find any of our Republican brethren deviating from the track. They always come to the scratch, no matter where or what the question is. As a distinguished gentleman before me on the other side said—and as it was in the Forty-eighth Congress I have a right to refer to it now—he said: "Tom, when are you going to bring in another election case?" I replied, "I do not know; perhaps to-morrow." He said, "I hope so; it always gratifies me to know that an election case is up, for it affords me another opportunity to vote the Republican ticket." [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I have shown, and I think satisfactorily, that the election returns from this precinct, Kelley's Island, and this Precinct B of the eighth ward of the city of Toledo, ought to be thrown out for the reasons that I have set forth; and when that is done it elects the contestant, Mr. Hurd.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if there is any evidence, or if any was adduced before the Committee on Elections, to show that any of these 74 men on Kelly's Island would have voted for Mr. Hurd if it had not been for the action of their employer?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will say to the gentleman no; because you see they had already been bulldozed before the election. The lash of the party had been placed upon them in ample time to secure their votes. And then, sir, if they could be bulldozed once they could be bulldozed again. But I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana that nobody ever tried to induce them to show that they had not been intimidated.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is no testimony, though, to show how they voted. I merely ask for information.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky inform the House if there is any evidence in the record, and if there is any will he read it, to show that these men voted at all?

Mr. ROBERTSON. There is none, because we did not know, except by this general intimidation——

Mr. WISE. How do you know they were intimidated, when you do not know how they voted? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. By the simple fact of the way they voted and other circumstances to which I have already referred.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to answer?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. The statement of the report is that Mr. Kelley stationed himself inside and near the polls, and made them show their tickets as they went in; and to one of these men it seems who had voted contrary to his wishes, and only one of them, he used the language "that he should be the first to go."

Mr. HENLEY. How many did he take in?

Mr. ROBERTSON. What is the question?

Mr. HENLEY. How many did he take in and make this threat to? I want to get at the facts of this case.

Mr. ROBERTSON. He went there before his men went to the polls.

Mr. HENLEY. But how many of his men were thus threatened or intimidated?

Mr. ROBERTSON. He had about 74——

Mr. BOYLE. The evidence is that three-fourths of Kelley's men had voted before Mr. Kelley got there at all.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But had not he already gone around among the men and told them how he wanted them to vote? Did he not bulldoze them before the election? Of course nobody was there to tell them exactly how they should vote just at the time. You did not have to go and threaten the men at the very moment they were about to put in their ballots to show that there had been intimidation. The intimidation was done before that. Nor do you have to show that they would have voted otherwise. That is for the contestee to show.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. PAYNE was recognized.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have not the floor. If the gentleman from New York will yield for a question I will be glad to answer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has been recognized.

Mr. PAYNE. I am perfectly willing to yield to the gentleman for a question if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have reserved the remainder of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy fifty minutes of the time, and yield the remainder to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY].

I congratulate the House that we have an election case before us that can be determined upon a plain question of law and of fact. I congratulate the House that we have a case in which there is no charge of personal corruption or of any personal wrong on the part of either candidate so far as the election is concerned. It seems to me if there ever was a case before the House in which every man can act as the judge of the election of his fellow-member this is the case; and I congratulate the House also on the fact that so many gentlemen have listened to the debate thus far. It seems to me an earnest on the part of the members of this House that they are to decide this question purely as a question of fact and as a question of law. Mr. Speaker, as has been said, the sitting member is here on a certificate of election with a majority of 239 behind him. From this majority the contestant seeks to deduct certain precincts in the city of Toledo, deduct Kelley's Island, and also numerous votes in different precincts in Toledo.

Much has been said about Precinct B in the eighth ward. This is the precinct on which the minority of the committee seem to be agreed; the six members of the minority signing both minority reports. It is alleged in this precinct that there are various irregularities. In the first place it is complained that, whereas the law provides that the clerks of the election shall be of opposite politics, the two clerks were Republicans. Let me call the attention of the House to the law upon this subject. Paragraph 3 of section 2933 of the revised statutes of Ohio provides that there shall be two judges of opposite politics; that each of these judges shall appoint a clerk, the clerks being of opposite politics; and then there is this clause:

> And if any judges or clerks fail to attend at the proper time or place, such judges and clerks and all additional judges and clerks shall be chosen by the electors of the ward.

Now, sir, it was perfectly competent on the morning of the 14th of October if the Democratic clerk appointed by the judges did not appear for the electors of the ward to appoint a clerk in his place; and there is no qualifying provision in this paragraph prescribing that he shall be a Democratic clerk or that he shall be of opposite politics to the clerk that does appear. So it will appear from the law itself there was an opportunity under the law for the electors to elect a Republican clerk in the place of a Democratic clerk. Now, if the contestant wished to contest this precinct because there were two clerks of the same politics it was incumbent upon him to show that the law had been violated, and that this emergency did not occur in which the electors of the precinct could provide a clerk on the morning of the election.

Then, it is alleged that one of the judges of the election, the Democratic judge, was not a resident of the precinct over which he presided. But, Mr. Speaker, the statute itself provides, not that the judges of the election shall be residents of the precinct, but that the judges of the election shall be residents of the ward in which they preside. He could be a resident of any precinct in the eighth ward and still would be eligible as a judge of the election. And it appears abundantly in the case that Judge Kelley, the Democratic judge, was a resident of the eighth ward and had been so for a great many years. So that there was no objection to the organization of the board under the statutes of Ohio.

Then the claim is made that there was so much fraud and corruption about this poll in Precinct B in the eighth ward, that we are required, judging from the law and facts, judging from the evidence adduced, the competent evidence in the case, to disfranchise 430 voters and to throw aside a majority of 220 for the sitting member. As has been well stated, this evidence of corruption rests entirely upon the evidence of this man Gerstmann. Now, I do not care whether several years ago he was a Jewish rabbi, presiding over a Jewish synagogue in the city of Saint Joseph, or not. His own evidence, his own cross-examination in the case, will convince any member in this House, who will stop to read it, that he is totally unworthy of belief.

He says that since 1870 he has not lived anywhere; he has existed. He says he has been East, West, North, and South, and he declines to answer where he has been. In the next breath he says he was in Helena, Ark. He was asked what he was doing there, and he declined to answer. Asked if there is any reason for his declining to answer, he declines to answer that. Being asked if he was in State prison during this period, from 1870 until that time, he declines at first to answer that; and then he says he does not know whether he has been in State prison or not.

Mr. HALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALL. I ask the gentleman whether Gerstmann's declining to answer all through that cross-examination was not evidently due to the insolence of the cross-examination by an attorney whom there was no judge to control?

Mr. PAYNE. Evidently not; for from the very outset of his cross-examination he began to decline to answer, as every lawyer in this House has seen witness after witness decline to answer, when a question was asked which might lead to something in his past life that he wished to cover up. It was not because of any insolence of the cross-examiner, but because he did not want his past history paraded before the notary or before this House or the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, he did answer some questions. He says that in 1880 he was living in California; that he was then a zealous advocate of the election of General Hancock; and if he had been elected that he expected an office under Hancock; that he expected to go to Jerusalem under the auspices of the Democratic government.

Mr. STRUBLE. Dead or alive? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. That does not appear. Then he says as soon as Garfield was elected he came on to Washington. He still wanted to go to Jerusalem under Garfield. He was here as an office-seeker under Garfield. He says he had persuaded Garfield, and but for his assassination he would have gone to Jerusalem under Garfield's administration. When asked to what political party he belonged he said, "Why, I do not belong to any party, Democratic or Republican." He said, "I belong to my own party." "What do you mean by your own party?" was the question. "Why, myself; 'self-preservation is the first law of nature.'"

Then we come down to 1884. He says he was in the employ of the Republican national committee; that he went to the city of Toledo; that he went to investigate there to see how the sentiment was in reference to Hurd and Romeis. He says he went around through the city among the Germans and found them all for Hurd, and that then he went to New York to report to the national Republican committee, being in their employ. When he got to New York what did he do there? Instead of going to the Republican national committee to report, he went straight to the Democratic national committee and had a little talk with them about finances, and two or three days later, at Cincinnati, he received a letter from the secretary of the national Democratic committee. The substance of that letter, he says, was that he was to go to the local committee and they would make arrangements with him for his services.

This is the man who was in the employ of the Republican national committee! Then he went over to the Republican national committee; and what did he tell them? He says he told them he had been up to Toledo and had talked with the Germans and that the sentiment was for Hurd, but that for beer the voters could be bought to vote the other way. "All you need," he said, "is to buy beer." "How much money is needed?" "Two or three thousand dollars." He says they told him that they would not let him have the money, but that what money they did send would be sent through the regular committee, the regular channels. Then he turns up again at Cincinnati, or at Columbus, at the headquarters of the Democratic State committee.

He says that the same night on which he received this letter—I think it was from Mr. Barnum, but I am not certain about that—on that same night, he says, he burned the letter. Then he testifies that he subsequently showed the same letter to a member of the Democratic State committee. That testimony is in the record—that he showed that letter after he had burned it. Then he went to Toledo again. He went there to see what had been done in the mean time, what change of sentiment had occurred. In the first place he testifies that he went there in about a week after his first visit; that he says he made three visits to Toledo; then he says it might have been two or three weeks after his first visit that he returned, but when he did return, lo, and behold! there was an entire change in the popular sentiment, and these Germans who had previously been shouting for Hurd were now all for Romeis.

He does not tell what they said that induced him to think that, but he says, "I thought from their looks that they had been satisfied; I thought there was no further use for me. When I went there first I was a great mogul among those Germans; but when I went there the second time I was nobody. I inferred from their looks," he says, "and I saw them 'jargooning' together (whatever that may mean), and I inferred from this that money had been sent and that beer had been bought, and they had turned and were all for Romeis."

That is the evidence of bribery in this case. It comes from a man who is self-impeached, and not a word of it is direct evidence, because this witness does not undertake to detail a word of conversation with any man save one, Mr. Warnke. Mr. Warnke lives in Precinct B in the eighth ward; and this witness closes his direct evidence by stating that outside of that precinct from fifty to seventy-five men had been corrupted. He gives no evidence whatever in regard to Precinct B on his direct examination. During the last days of the examination, after the forty days had expired in which the contestant might take his evidence, and the forty days in which the contestee might answer it had passed, and during the last ten days when contestee had the right to put in his rebuttal, this man Gerstmann was again examined, and, for some reason not explained in the evidence, each time he was examined in Washington. He claimed to hail from Cincinnati. Why he should be brought from Cincinnati to Washington to testify in this Toledo case does not appear. At all events the last examination is the only one in which he gives any evidence in regard to Precinct B in the eighth ward.

I will read what he testifies on that subject. It will be found on page 129 of the testimony:

Q. What was said, at your last visit to Toledo before the election, by Warnke and other voters in Precinct B, in ward 8, as to money or other considerations having been satisfactorily furnished to the voters of that precinct to carry it for Romeis?

A. From the general conversations with Warnke and others living in that neighborhood there was no doubt in my mind that money and other materials were furnished to defeat Mr. Hurd in that precinct. There was no further use for me, and I left Toledo. My reasons for leaving, no doubt, is from the conversations which I had on that subject with Warnke and other voters of that precinct. I was satisfied in my own mind that Romeis would carry that precinct, notwithstanding at my first visit everything was for Hurd there. Had it not been for the use of money and other considerations used in the political machinery, Hurd would certainly have carried the precinct.

That is the only evidence that there is in regard to Precinct B in the eighth ward. That is the evidence that the minority put in their report; it is the only evidence on this point that the contestant puts into his brief in this case to show corruption in Precinct B. And, Mr. Speaker, on that evidence members of this House, sitting as judges, are asked seriously to vote that there was bribery and corruption there. True, the contestant calls Louis Jahn, a man who figures as a Republican judge, although on his cross-examination he says, substantially, that he voted the Democratic ticket. He does not say that in so many words, but no man can read his cross-examination without coming to the conclusion that he did vote the Democratic ticket in October. He testifies, as was read by Mr. BOYLE, to as much as he knows about money being used. His testimony is that Henry Gates paid "about nineteen ticket peddlers" from $2 to $10 apiece, the night after the election, at Joe Boldt's grocery. On cross-examination he gave this testimony:

Q. Were you at Joe Boldt's grocery on the night after the election?
A. No sir.
Q. Did you see any money paid?
A. No, sir.
Q. How do you know that Henry Gates paid any money?
A. I know it by what Henry Gates told me.

That is all the evidence there is in this case of bribery, every word of it. You see it is all hearsay evidence, and very indefinite too. Yet we are asked to say that there was bribery and corruption in that precinct, and we are asked upon such testimony to throw out 430 votes. It has been gravely asserted here that Henry Gates, being the vice-president of the Republican club in that precinct, was an agent for the Republican party, and that what he said after election was binding on Mr. Romeis!

What a proposition of law to be addressed to the understanding of lawyers! What an extension of the idea of agency! Can you find it in any of the books? Why, every book has been ransacked; and it seems there was a case in England some time in the seventeenth century, under their election laws, where each candidate for Parliament appoints his own agents for the different districts; and in that case it appears it was held that what the agents of the candidate said during the canvass and before the election became a part of the res gestæ, and might be considered as an admission against the candidate himself. But, thank God, no case can be found in this country in which it has been held that every member of a political organization is to be considered as the agent of the candidate of that party, and whatever he may say after the election binds the man who was selected as a candidate by that same party.

That is all there is of corruption in Precinct B of the eighth ward. I think it may be safely dismissed from the case. But it is said there was some irregularity about the counting of the votes. It is said the statute provides that the inspectors must take the ballots out of the box one by one, unfold them, and read them, and they must be tallied one by one. The statute does say just about that. But what lawyer on this floor does not know that the provision is merely directory, not mandatory; that a statute prescribing the time and place of holding an election is mandatory, but provisions of law as to the canvass and return of votes are merely directory; and whether these directory provisions of the statute are observed by the judges and returning officers or not, the honest voter is not defrauded of his vote? No principle of law to the contrary of this has ever been evolved from any election committee, even of a State Legislature or from any city court in Philadelphia.

Now, what is the fact about this precinct? Judge Kelley, the Democratic judge, testifies that when the ballot-box was opened the officers took all the ballots out of the box and laid them on the table, having first swept the room; that he and one other judge began to count these ballots, he counting a part and the other judge another part. There was no tallying between them. One did not count what the other counted, but each counted a different part. And on that count there was an excess of 7 votes over the names on the tally-sheet, there being four hundred and thirty names on the tally-sheet; not four hundred and thirty-one, as erroneously stated in the report of the minority. I want to correct the error on this point. The tally-sheets were prepared beforehand. The blank for the names were numbered consecutively in print, so that each name appeared after its own true number. When they got down to number 363 the clerks inserted a name, but for some reason the voter was challenged and did not vote, withdrew his ticket, and that name and number were crossed off, so that though the last number was 431, only four hundred and thirty men voted at that precinct.

Now, on this first informal count, each one counting a part—and we all know the liability of men to make mistakes in counts of that nature—there were 7 votes over. Then these same two judges counted the ballots back into the ballot-box, each counting a part again, and there were 3 or 4 votes over—433 or 434 in all. Then they commenced their regular official count. They separated the ballots—the Republican and Democratic ballots—into distinct piles and commenced counting them off by fives, Judge Kelley counting off five and handing them to the next judge, and he counting them over to see if the five tickets were there all right, and the clerks tallied the five tickets, which were then handed to the third judge, who strung them on a string, under a provision of the statute. So they counted that entire box of ballots; and when they got through they found there were only 426, of which Mr. Hurd had 103 and Mr. Romeis 323. There was a deficiency of four tickets. What should they do? There was some talk about counting again. Then Louis Jahn, who did no counting at all—he was the man who put them on the string—objected to the count being repeated, but proposed that they add 2 votes to each candidate, making 430 votes; and that is what they did. But that is not all of the tally of those tickets. The clerk of the election swears that they counted the ballots that had been strung on the string, and they found just 426 tickets, corresponding exactly with the counts.

Now, what is there about that count that any man can not rectify at once? They added 2 votes to each candidate—to the candidate for secretary of state and the candidate for Congress. It makes no difference in the result whether you strike out those 2 votes for Mr. Hurd and Mr. Romeis or not. You still have 220 majority. You can get at the exact count from the evidence of these men. Yet because this official return had been impeached sufficiently to show that 4 votes were irregularly added, we are asked to disfranchise this precinct and throw it out.

That is the evidence, the whole evidence, in regard to Precinct B of the eighth ward. Then there is Kelley's Island. The statement in regard to Kelley's Island will be found at page 95 of the record. It is hearsay evidence as to what Mr. Kelley told Mr. Alvord that he had told his men; but I select this evidence because it is the strongest statement of what Mr. Kelley said, being stronger than the statement made by Mr. Kelley upon the stand.

He said he considered Mr. Hurd's views on the tariff very detrimental to his interests, and that if Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Hurd were elected—that if Mr. Hurd's views should prevail under a Democratic administration, he should probably not want over one-third the men in his business who were then employed, and that if he was compelled to discharge any of his men, he would discharge those first who were not working for his interest.

That is all Mr. Kelley said to his men. If Cleveland, if Hurd were elected—if Mr. Hurd's views prevailed—if his business failed because of it and he should not want more than one-third or one-half of the men he then employed, he would discharge first those who had voted against his interest. He did say that.

Now what is the proof of the influence that threat, if you call it a threat, had upon the men in Kelley's employ? There is not a scintilla of evidence that one of these men voted for Mr. Romeis, or that one of these men voted the Republican ticket. There is not a scintilla of evidence but that these men were Republicans on the start.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN] called attention to the fact that it was proved in the case that Mr. Kelley himself walked up to the polls with one of his men and voted him against Mr. Hurd, that he so walked up to the polls with one of his men by the name of Peter Diffley. Peter Diffley was called to the stand, and he said Mr. Kelley did not speak to him on the day of the election. He did not walk up to the polls, he did not hand him a ticket, he did not ask him to vote; and so that fails by the testimony of the man himself.

Some eight or ten were called of those who were in Kelley's employ, and I think by the record it was proved every one of them voted against Mr. Kelley's view and voted for Mr. Hurd.

Yet you are asked to throw out this precinct without a word of proof that anything Kelley said had any influence on his men. Why, gentlemen, these mechanics are made of different stuff from that. If an employer makes such a threat their manhood asserts itself, and they are more apt to vote the other way under the influence of such a threat. They have some idea of American freedom and independence. They think they are a part of the sovereignty of the country, and they have a right to a voice in the decision of its affairs. Their manhood has not been emasculated. They are ready to vote, and to vote their own opinions; and they will vote them all the more readily if they think anybody like an employer is attempting to turn them away from their honest convictions.

Thus much for Kelley's Island. Then come the illegal votes claimed in the city of Toledo. After the notice of contest had been served, after the issue had been made up, and four or five months after the election, they began to make a comparison between the poll-lists made up by one of the clerks at the October election and the poll-lists made by one of the clerks at the November election, there being a different clerk at each election. They found at various wards in Toledo some seven hundred and odd names appearing in the October election which they did not in the November election. These they found in different wards and precincts, and then got one or two or three men and called them upon the witness-stand who swore they did not know men of those names living in those precincts and wards.

I believe none of these men ever were inspectors of elections. It did appear some of them had taken the school census and found out who the school children were living in those precincts, and of course they had some knowledge of the school children. It did appear some were assessors and knew who were upon the assessors' books in some of these precincts. But every man who has property to be assessed is not necessarily a voter.

Afterward Mr. Romeis had occasion to examine these lists and bring residents of these different wards and precincts to say whether these men in October actually lived in the wards and were voters or not.

Let me call attention to another curious position, or rather legal proposition, which is advanced in this case; and that is, if a contestant brings evidence tending to show a man is not a resident where he voted, then it becomes incumbent upon the contestee not only to prove the man is a resident, but to prove he is twenty-one years of age, to prove he is a native or a naturalized citizen, and to prove he has all the qualifications of a voter. I shall not spend any time in arguing that proposition. It does not devolve on the contestee to disprove anything that has not been proved by the contestant in the case.

And if he has any evidence in the case showing that men are not residents of the precinct, it only devolves upon the contestee to show that they were residents at the time of the election; and if he does that, then he has met the case.

Well, they took up these different lists—they took the list copied by one clerk in a precinct in October, and they took the list copied by the other clerk in the same precinct in November, and on a comparison of the lists it was found that in many instances the names were entirely different; scarcely any two names were alike on the list. Bear in mind that each name was numbered, so there could be no mistake as to who was intended by each clerk; and yet a comparison of names entered by these two clerks acting at the same time at the same poll showed such a discrepancy in the names that you could hardly recognize them. You can readily see how this could happen. A German name announced by a judge of election would be liable to be misunderstood and misspelled by the clerk who registered the name; and a specimen of these differences is set forth in the majority report, which I hope the members of this House will find time not only to examine but will compare the two lists of names. Here is the list:

Mr. Romeis called the old residents of the ward as witnesses; he called old inspectors of election; he called men who had made a canvass of the votes immediately before the October election, and proved from all of these sources that out of the 700 names that had been deducted by the contestant all but 72 were residents of the precinct and wards in which they had voted on the 14th day of October, 1884. Of these 72 names, if they are apportioned out to the two candidates as the minority would have them apportioned it would be almost a tie between Mr. Hurd and Mr. Romeis, I think 35 in one case and 37 in the other.

It is claimed by the minority of the committee that the only way to purge the returns of these 72 alleged illegal voters is to take each precinct of a ward by itself, and hold that that is a complete election district or a complete part of an election district, and that these illegal votes belonging to that district should be deducted from the majority candidate so far only as to reduce his vote to a tie in that precinct. Such a proposition as that, it seems to me, is most illogical. It is not the precinct voting for delegates to elect a man to Congress; it is the man who gets the majority in the district, even if he did not carry but one of the precincts, and the other, his opponent, had carried all the rest. A contrary construction would be absurd. There is no common sense, there is no logic in such a deduction.

Bear in mind, too, that there is not a particle of evidence as to how the men voted, except that established by the face of the returns themselves, which show that in each precinct there was a falling off of the Democratic votes between the election held in October and the one in November, and in every ward there was a sufficient falling off to cover every illegal vote, even those claimed by contestant himself, all of them showing a reduction of the Democratic vote.

If they were illegal, if the men had disappeared after the October election, their vote does not show in the count in November. The absence of the votes in the November election was accounted for by the loss of the Democratic vote in November as compared with the Democratic vote in October; and that evidence would seem to be conclusive; for if these men were illegal voters, every one of them must have voted the Democratic ticket in October, because the Democratic vote fell off and was less in November. Then, on the other hand, every ward except one exhibits an increase of the Republican vote in November over the Republican vote in October, except, as I say, in one ward; and in that there was a loss of 5 Republican votes. So, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how these alleged illegal votes, even admitting them to be illegal, can be deducted from the count of either candidate or can affect the election in the least.

But let us go a little further. What is the presumption? They claim that because these 700 names can not be found by the witnesses they produced, or rather because they were unknown to them, they were therefore illegal votes. And the contestee takes up the issue and shows that all but 72 were residents of the precincts. I say what is the presumption as to the 72? Is it not strong and conclusive that the 72 were legal voters? Is it not a wonder that, five months after the election in October, in a city of 50,000 inhabitants, a city that cast 8,000 votes in October, every one of these voters of the 8,000 can be found, except 72, five months afterward? I say is it not conclusive that there is no evidence of a single illegal vote in any one of these precincts in Toledo?

Another point is raised as to Precinct C in the third ward of that city. I see that one of the minority reports takes no account of the assault upon these 166 votes that are sought to be deducted from the majority of Mr. Romeis. What is the truth in regard to Precinct C? At this precinct a man named Robert H. Bell, a resident of the precinct for forty years and a resident of the ward at the date of the election, who ever since he had been a resident and voter had been a judge at the elections in that precinct, who was certified by Democratic judges who were called as witnesses as a man of the highest character and integrity in that precinct—that on the night when they were counting the votes in October, Bell said to them, "Boys, you want to hurry up the count;" and when the tickets which had been taken from the ballot-box and placed on the table were exhausted in the count, he put his hand into the box, one witness says three times, and took out some tickets and laid them on the table to be counted.

Another witness says he put his hand in the box and took out one handful of tickets. Bell himself says he attempted to put his hand in the box to take out tickets, and one of the judges said to him, "Hold on, Bob;" and he did not interfere after that.

There is some question in the case as to whether this occurred in October or in November; but I think the weight of the evidence is that the November witnesses are mistaken and that this did occur in October. But how does it vitiate the count? How does it invalidate the return? How is it any excuse or pretext for the throwing out this poll whether it occurred in October or November? The testimony is that Bell took these tickets out of the box and put them on the table and that every one of them was counted by the judges, and when they got through with the count it agreed with the poll-list as reported by the clerks, and they returned it according to the facts.
